The Pride of Llewellyn

all know who the fellow was that frightened you so in the church, where he never should have been permitted to come at least on such an occasion as that of this morning. He is one William Simmons, a stonemason's laborer, who used to work on this very street, and past the house several times a day.

"He is Arthur Powis. Do you think that the disguise of a workman's dress and a hood could deceive me?"

"Gladys, I will have that man sought for and brought to your presence, to convince you he is William Simmons, a stonemason's laborer, who has lived and worked in New York for years!" said Mrs. Llewellyn.

"I take you at your word!" cried Gladys eagerly. "I accept the challenge! Bring him here! Bring him quickly! That I may tell him all, and vindicate myself before him—and go forth with him!"

"Very well, my dear, I will certainly do so. And now, Gladys, love, be reasonable, and take a glass of wine to revive our strength. See dear, I will bring you the decanter and a clean glass, and you shall pour the wine out for yourself, and so your injurious suspicions may not deprive you of a necessary stimulant," said the lady, as she went to bring the tray upon which the decanter and glasses stood.

"What!" said Gladys, "as you old tricks again so soon, Mrs. Jay?"

"Gladys! for shame! help yourself to the wine!" said the lady, recoiling and then offering the tray.

"Now no, Mrs. Jay! I cannot trust you Mrs. Jay! You may have drugged the whole decanter, for aught that I know! I cannot trust you, Mrs. Jay! I should be an idiot to do so!"

"Gladys! beware! How dare you speak so to me?"

"Madam! do you beware! How dare you ask me such a question and brave the answer that I can make? Why do I speak to you thus? Why? Because from the very first moment you entered my father's house at Kadir Idris, as an honored guest, and a cherished relative to this moment, that you stand here over the wreck of his only daughter wrecked by your contrivance, you have been guilty of the blackest treachery toward him, your benefactor—toward me, your ward! From the moment you entered that house you resolved to become its mistress. You threw your devilish spells over my father's mind and heart, and over my own. The old man and the young girl were equally unsuspecting of guile!"

"First, no doubt, you designed to become my father's second wife, and rule him and me and our estate from that position! But my father's fidelity to the memory of my dear mother was too strong even for your fascinations to undermine!"

"Gladys! be silent! I command you!" interrupted the enraged woman.

"I will not! I am a Llewellyn, and do not understand commands, except those I issue! Finding you could not be my father's wife, you instigated yourself into his confidence, and became his trusted friend! He could not marry you; but he gave you the greatest proof of confidence a man could give a woman—he made you the sole guardian of his orphan daughter, the sole trustee of her estate! How did you repay his confidence? How did you discharge your duties? First, as soon as my father had made his will, investing you all this irresponsible power—"

"A power that I still hold," hissed the woman, in a low, deep, threatening voice.

"A power that you still assume, and criminally abuse; but that you no longer legally hold, madam! for whether now I am a wife or a widow, since I was married I have ceased to be your ward."

"We shall—but you interrupt me, Mrs. Jay. I was about to tell you why I spoke to you in the way you found so objectionable. I say, from the time my dear father made that fatal will, giving you all this power, he sickened with strange disease. Oh, Heaven of heaven! My dear, lost father, I dare not dwell upon the manner of his death! Mrs. Jay, what was the disease my father died of?"

"Gladys, cease this insane raving. I say!" gasped the woman, turning white as death.

"The doctors, with all their skill, could not discover its nature nor alleviate its pangs. He died, Mrs. Jay, what did he die of?"

"Gladys! cease, cease, I say!" exclaimed the woman, stamping.

"I will not. You asked me for a 'why'. I will give you one, and a 'wherefore' at the back of it. My father died. You best know how. No sooner was he under the sod than you began your machinations against my peace and honor. You intercepted all the letters between me and my betrothed, and subjected me to a cruel anxiety and suspense that preyed upon my health and spirits for many months. When in spite of all you could do or say my faith in my dear Arthur, I still trusted him, you produced forged letters purporting to be my father's written commands—divine commands to his child to break off her engagement with Mr. Powis and to wed—whom?—your idiotic son, James Stukely. When in spite of all this, my betrothed returned to me, and we rejected the forged letters and their false counsel, you, by an act of arbitrary power, made me a prisoner in my own room. When favored by fortune, I made my escape and gave my hand in marriage to Arthur you followed us! Like some foul and prowling beast of prey you crept secretly on our track. I saw you on one day. On the next I saw not my husband. What became of him, Mrs. Jay?"

"Gladys! I will not be outraged in my own house!"

"Gladys! I will not be outraged in my own house!"

"Gladys! I will not be outraged in my own house!"

"Gladys! I will not be outraged in my own house!"

It Works! Try It

Tells how to loosen a sore, tender corn so it lifts out without pain.

Good news spreads rapidly and druggists here are kept busy dispensing freezone, the ether discovery of a Cincinnati man, which is said to loosen any corn so it lifts out with the finger.

Ask at any pharmacy for a quarter ounce of freezone, which will cost very little, but is said to be sufficient to rid one's feet of every hard or soft corn or callus.

You apply just a few drops on the tender, aching corn and instantly the soreness is relieved, and soon the corn is so shriveled that it lifts out without pain. It is a sticky substance which dries when applied and never inflames or even irritates the adjoining tissue.

This discovery will prevent thousands of deaths annually from lockjaw and infection heretofore resulting from the suicidal habit of cutting corns.
