The Widow's Son

By Mrs. E. Southworth

drop asleep than my spirit flies home. Oh, these dreams mamma! they are so lifelike and perplexing, they are almost enough to baffle my intellect. Every time I dream of being at home I feel so sure that it is a living reality and no dream! And then I wake up and feel the motion of the ship and hear the noise of the machinery and the beating of the waves, and I remember that I am on the ocean—far, far away from my dear home, and going farther every day! And I feel a desperate wish to turn the steamer around and then I know that it is impossible for me to do so, and that I must go farther and farther, farther and farther over this broad ocean from my dear home, and I grow wild and feel dangerous impulses that I can scarcely control, and then I cry all the rest of the night. "Oh, my child, I am sorry to hear this. Was it varying all last night that made your eyes so red and swollen this morning?" "Yes, mamma, but I did not wish you to see my red eyes and feel distressed about me, and that was the reason I stayed away from the breakfast table, but you came in, and the truth came out." "As it was right that it should my dear." "Oh, mamma I had such a lovely moaning dream of home last night—I was sure it was a reality. What was it, darling?" said Mrs. Powis who thought it was good to encourage her daughter to talk. "I dreamt that we sailed on to Liverpool, and took the return steamer, and came back to New York. Then I dreamt you put me on board the ferry boat to go to Hoboken alone, and that I landed and walked up

Healthy, Happy Boys and Girls

Is your child healthy? Is he or she up to standard weight, of good color, with plenty of rich, red blood to nourish the growing tissues?

For children who are thin, pale, anaemic, under weight, nervous, restless, sleepless, Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is of the greatest benefit imaginable.

Being mild and gentle in action, and yet wonderfully potent as a restorative, it soon makes the blood rich and builds up the feeble nerves.

the lane leading to our cottage. And I knew I hadn't been gone more than a month, though I felt as if it had been years, and I looked up at the old familiar shops and houses to see if any change had come over them in my absence, but none had come. Oh, it seemed so real! And I dreamt that I reached the cottage and that they were all so glad to see me, and we were all sitting on the porch. There was Owen and myself, and Lily Gay and Willie Spicer. "Who is he, my dear?" "An old friend of ours—a young medical student." "Ah—old friend, but young student. Go on my dear?" "Well, I dreamt that we four were sitting in the porch. I was sitting in the corner with my chair tilted back against the post. It was a chilly October weather like this, and all the rosebushes in the yard were withered. It was just after sunset, and the western horizon was flushed with red which was reflected in the river below us. Across the river I saw the shipping of New York. Oh, it seemed all so real. 'Go on, my darling.' "I dreamt that as I sat there I saw them all. The reason of my going away and the incidents of my absence. And particularly I told Owen how homesick I was when on my voyage out, and what Xantalzin dreams I used to have of being at home. Was not that strange?" "Yes, my dear, it was a curious introversion of thought." "I thought I held my hand above head and toyed with the withered leaves of the rosebush that grew up by the post, as I said to Owen, 'I have often dreamt of being at home when it has seemed as real as this. And indeed so like this, that I am almost prompted to fancy this a dream. So I will crush one of these withered roses, thorns and all in my hands and prove that his at least is a reality, since if it was a dream I should be sure to awake and—wake up, to find myself lying here with my hand upon the swing of pin-cushion, that I had fastened that I had fastened to the one of my berth—woke up, to find that I was again deceived by a dream, and that I was not at home but on board this outward bound steamer many hundred miles from my dear brother, and going farther and farther at every turn of the wheel. Oh, mamma, what an agony of disappointment it was and what a shock to my faith in the stability and reality of all things. Even now mamma I have a sort of hope that I am really at home, and only dreaming that I am on the steamer. My mind is growing confused mamma. My dreams are so real, and my waking experiences so dreamy, that I scarcely can tell one from the other." "My poor, dear child your heart and brain have been too severely tried. Be at peace, my darling, for be assured that your happiness is the first consideration with both your father and myself," said Mrs. Powis pressing a kiss upon her daughter's brow. "And—will you send me back, mamma?" "We will take you back my darling." "When, dear mamma?" "By the first steamer that returns after our arrival at Liverpool." "Oh, dear mamma how far are we from Liverpool?" "We are about half way across the ocean, my love." "Then we are about fifteen hundred miles from Liverpool. And when we get there we shall be three thousand miles away. That added to the fifteen hundred will make four thousand five hundred miles that we shall have to sail over before we can see Owen." "Yes my love, but we shall be able to do it all in three or four weeks. And now that you have my promise you must be reasonable. And your first reasonable act must be to take your breakfast. And the you must rise and dress and come up on deck."
