

which they get for it. But the Canadian is at once a citizen of the Dominion, of his province and of his municipality, contributing out of the same income to pay the bills of all three administrations. Sometimes, perhaps, he is a little careless in determining precisely what he contributes to each of these authorities and what he receives in return, and the present comparison aims only at showing him that the Dominion Government, at least, does not take more out of his pocket than is actually required for the efficient carrying on of the multifarious activities imposed upon it by the constitution of the Dominion, together with the discharge of the obligations due to the creditors of the nation, including under this head both those who have lent their money and those other more meritorious creditors who contributed their own health or the lives of their dear ones to the cause of their country during the Great War.
