THE BETROTHAL;

un, HOW MR. QUINT WAS ENGAGED, AND AT LAST SUCCEEDED IN GETTING MARRIED. Translated for the Evening Post,

THE valley wherein Mr. Quint deek, and in the midst of which his estate lay, was certainly one of the most beautiful in the country. It was particularly so in spring, when red and white biossome gittered on the trees; when flowers shone on the banks of the streams, in the laps of the meadows, and on the bosoms of the maidens. To the traveller, it appeared as if the valley kept an eternal holyday; and Homer's gods, of whom Ovid says more than he can answer for, would certainly have arranged their little love affairs there, if it had been known to them in their young days.

At the southern end of the vale lived his good friend Mr. Pyk, much like himself, unmarried as he was, though a widower possessed also of a single estate, that had been formerly an old knightly castle, with monts, loop-holes and towers. Mr. Pyk, a round little man, of a serone disposition, loved company, and was therefore always bustling about from village to town, particularly in the winter season, when time hung heavy on his hands. Mr. Pyk liked to talk about everything. It was easy to see that he indeed thought himself made for an orat. T. He was naturally way would be the would infallibly be lost. and mothers knitting under the shadow of the over-henging rook off their little dwellings.
Leading to the left from the streem toward the foot of a high mountain well, a stony road ascend-ed to the castle of Mr. Pyk, of which a square tower alone, was visible through the andustring groves in the distance. Here the traveller found a refrushing ecolores between green hillocks, and under the broad widespread branches of the chesnut and sak. In this remantic little nock Mr. Quint was wont generally to rest, for the way to the castle became rather steep. I know not how it was, but this time he was tarbhieur to his old habit. He was, thursform, the more tired, and the more heated, when he had reached the spacious laws on the summit, just before the castle. Mr. Quint in-ferred that his friend must have had a great wash-ing on that day, for the whole spot was soven over, to the rich and led.

ferred that his friend must have had a great washing on that day, for the whole spot was soven over, to the right and left, with ropes, on which soonwhite lin-u was flapping, so that a passage through it could hardly be effected.

Without much consideration, Kr. Quint found it arreas ble to atretch himself, for a moment or so, in the soft grans, under the shade of a great table-cloth that was hanging from the rope above him. Thus, with his face turned toward earth, he dremningly contemplated the landscape is the grans. if it had been known to them in their young days.

The valley is nine mifes long, and in the form of an ovel, for it is about three miles wide, and enis compassed by high mountains in whose bosom villages the embowered, and whose summits are vertisent with broad evergreens. Old feudal cast, the safe perched on solitary cl.ffs, near the base of the meuntain.

Lengthwise through this wonderful valley there rushes a wild stream, that often damages its banks in its ill-humour, and is the only peacebreaker that the villagers know. A main road lead all ternately on both sides of the stream, creeping shyly along the skirts of the mountain, and only descending into the plain when a hamlet invites it to stop a while.

Without much consideration, Kr. Quiet found it acreeable to stretch bimself, for a moment or so, in the soft grass, sudar the shade of a great tables eith that was hanging from the rope above him. Thus, with his face turned toward earth, he dreamingly contemplated the landscape in the grass to the same of solomon Gessner's ldyla. Lonely little b-nats wandered in the shade of the broad spires to the grass-forest that rose as proud as easiern palm trees over the lovely m as bushel. Sometimes his eye followed the gast, the bird of this take own forest; and sometimes the industrious and, that ran to the lopmost point of a spire, overlocked the distant country and quickly returned. All of a sudden, the found is a present that the stream, the found is a present that the point of the mountain and only descending into the plain when a hamlet invites it to stop a while. one ani, that ran to the logmost point of a spire, overhoked the distant country and quickly returned. All of a sudden, Mr. Quint's contemplations were disturbed by a remarkable insect, that certainly was never designed to inhabit the landscape in the grass.

The valley is now topographically described, and at a time such a provision is absolutely needed for their families.

No: more than a span and a quarter from his nose, there appeared before him the two feet of one human lorm, that did horrible mischiel in the quiet grass country. It must be owned, they were a pair of dainty feet. Mr. Quint was nowhere to the found. If his neighbors had not seen him delity with their own eyes, they would have swurn that he lived any where but in the valley.

He was naturally very good tempered, although he as always contriving law suits in order to plead in public. Once harf gwon a suit that he thought unjust, he went laughingly to his adversary, returned, what really belonged to him, and paid the costs.

This action excited the attention of Mr. Quint. He so in found an opportunity of becoming acquainted with Mr. Pyk, and they were both in a short time intimate friends. Mr. Quint honored the rhetoreal and hospitable acquirements of Mr. Pyk, and he Mr. Quint's learning. The lattle promiseuses intercourse that Mr Quint had with manhind, had probably caused his aw kandsean ingeneral society. Notasithatanding this, no one could deny that he man an agreeable man. A solitary life, and the happinese that said, it mak so no too reserved; but too much company, on the contrary, makes ane quie diffuse and politic. Men in solitude resemble planta on the high Alps, which though, simple and without ornam at, have substance and vigor.

It was natural that Mr. Quant and Mr. Pak should be friends, though of dissimilar characters. Both had good and pure natures; and what differences there were gave a spice and a charm to their intercourse. Mere of the mine opinions, and the same disposition, are reidem very intimate.
