HELEN MOIR

—OR—
Love and Honour.
A TALE OF THE CLAYDE.
CHAPTER XVI.

THE SACRIFICE COMPLETED—DAYS OF DARKNESS—ANOTHER THRILLING REVELATION.
Madame laid down her sewing, took on her spectacles, and said in a quiet tone—
"My dear, you need not fret any more about Hermann's marriage; it is not to take place."
He started violently and turned to stare at her with a silent stare.
"It is true—quite true," she added.
"Oh, he has come to his senses at last, has he? He expected I would relent, and finding his expectation wrong, the consequence frightens him. Of course he has commissioned you to favour me with the communication."
"No, my dear, he is wrong in every particular. It is Helen, not Hermann, who has withdrawn from the engagement. She has shown herself to be a girl of unparalleled honour and integrity."
"Gammion! I understand it. Finding that Hermann is to be disinherited, and her ambitious expectations thereby frustrated, she has given him up."
"No, no, no," returned Madame, shaking her head emphatically. "Your idea of the character and principles of Helen Moir is altogether false. She is not governed by the desires nor actuated by the motives you assign to her. She is wholly unselfish and disinterested."
"Don't tell me," said the Herrdoggery.
"Didn't she refuse to give up her claim on Hermann, though she knew I wished it? A disinterested girl would not have thrust herself into a family above her station, or where she knew she was not wanted. But it is indeed true what you tell me—has she indeed given him up? and is the odious marriage totally abandoned?"
"It is indeed."
"Ha! that is a satisfaction I did not look for, after all that has come and gone. Well, what does that obstinate, disobedient boy now think of the claimer who infatuated him? Will he warrant he has got his eyes opened, and regrets that he did not take my advice?"
"Utterly wrong, my dear, utterly wrong. Hermann admires and loves Helen more than ever."
"What! though she has cast him off? The silly fool is worse even than I thought him."
"Wait a moment, papa. She has not cast him off; her love for Hermann is stronger and nobler than ever it was."
"Oh, come, wife," cried the wine merchant, impatiently; "you know I am no hand at reading riddles; if you have anything to tell, do it in plain words, though all that is interesting to me you have told already. The marriage project is broken off, and that is the chief thing to me."
"Do you remember, in your interview with her, the assurance she gave you that if shame or disgrace was to be brought to Hermann or his family by a connection with her or hers, she would never become his wife?"
"Oh, yes, I remember she said so, but treated the words as so much idle breath."
"Ah, my dear, Helen Moir is not a girl who spends idle breath. She meant what she said, and now she has proved it. A sad revelation has been made to her—something she never knew, never dreamed of. Her father, it seems, is not dead, as she supposed—at least he did not die at the time she thought he had. He committed some crime which forced him to quit the country."
"Ah, transported for robbery or sheep-stealing, I suppose?"
"No, he never was tried; he went away to escape the consequences, and has been never since heard of. Helen knew nothing of this till a few days ago. She believed she was an orphan. No sooner did the fact come to her knowledge than she, preferring honour to all else, gave Hermann back his troth."
"Humph! Well, that is better than I expected," said the Herrdoggery, softened in spite of himself. "But, I say," he hastily added, "is there no danger of the thing being renewed, eh?"
"None. The resolution they have taken is final and irrevocable."
"Say you so? Your news put new life in me. The boy may marry Mignon still."
Madame smiled quietly, but said nothing. She could have hazarded a conjecture as to Mignon's affections being fixed elsewhere; but she did not deem it prudent to say what she thought.
"Hermann will never marry another," she said, with a sigh.
"Bah!—don't you believe that nonsense. He may think so just now; but when the edge of his disappointment has worn off, I don't despair of persuading him. Of course, he will return to us, and things shall go on as they were before. Silly boy, he has put us all comfoundedly about; but he has got a lesson which I have no doubt will do him good."
So spoke the worldly-minded wine merchant—spoke in his spiritual ignorance and incapacity. To him such love as that which existed between Hermann and Helen was light shining in the darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not. His wife had deeper and truer insight; but she had long since come to know how vain it was to try to make the Herr see beyond the range of practical and commercial vision, and she wisely kept silent, leaving it to time to show her husband how tasteless were his hopes.
