PERFECT TONE

Once More Danny and Nanny Enjoy Hospitality of the Big Straw Stack

By THORNTON W. BURGESS. Danny and Nanny Meadow Mouse lived quite contentedly in Farmer Brown's cornerib for a while. They were sure that never in all the Great World had there been two such rich Meadow Mice before. There was so much corn that if they should eat they couldn't eat it all up, even though they should live to be twice as old as most Meadow Mice get to be. So they looked forward to winter without a sold as most depend to winter without a sold as most meadow. forward to winter without a worry of any kind.

Then one day Farmer Brown's Boy moved the board by which they got in and out of the corncrib. It happened that both of them were at home at the time. They didn't know what had happened until Danny that night started to go outside. Then he found there was no way of getting out unless he jumped down to the ground. It he did that there would be no way of getting that there would be no way of getting

But Danny and Nanny decided that this didn't matter. They would spend their time eating, sleeping and exploring that cornerib. This they did, and were happy for a while. But at last they began to grow tired of nothing but corn to eat. First Danny lost his appetite. He grew peevish. Then Nanny lost her appetite, and she grew even more peevish. They quarreled, and they really didn't know what they were quarreling about. Both had been fat—very fat indeed. But now they began to grow thin. One day Nanny noticed this. It set her to thinking.

"I know what's the trouble with us," she cried. But Danny and Nanny decided that set her to thinking.

"I know what's the trouble with us," she cried.

"What?" squeaked Danny.

"We have too much of a good thing." said she. "We have too much corn. We need a change. We have lost our appetites because we need something besides corn. Corn for breakfast, corn for dinner, and corn for supper is altogether too much corn. I am getting so I hate the sight of it. If we could get outside and get something else for a change we would be all right."

But they couldn't get outside. At least, they couldn't get outside and get back again. And though they hunted and hunted and hunted they could find nothing in that corncrib for a change. It was a case of eat corn or nothing. Beyond a doubt it was a case of too much of a good thing. Danny began to think of that barn they had planned to make their home in before they had found the corncrib. There would be plenty of change of food there. To be sure, they wouldn't be quite so safe as they were here. Here no enemies could get to them. But even safety and plenty of food were not the only things to be considered. There was not enough happiness, and, after ali, hapipness was the most important thing.

"I'm going to leave this place," saii Danny one evening just after the Black Shadows had come creeping out. "Are you coming with me, Nanny Meadow Mouse?"

"Indeed I am," repiled Nanny.

"You know we can't get back if we
