The "Gotten-Through- a-Want-Ad" Servant Is Usually The Best To Be Had!

If you've stopped looking for the "ideal servant" and will be satisfied to find simply an EFFICIENT one—with a fair share of human frailties, but with counterbalancing human virtues—then a reasonable amount of want advertising will help you to "put your house in order again!"
And the delays are not many — the actual failures to find a suitable servant at all, through want advertising are too rare to count in the general summing up of results.

Written in Fire..

BY
FLORENCE
MARRYAT

"I wish you wouldn't wake me up in the middle of the night to guess riddles," said his cousin, peevishly. "Whatever has put such an idea into your head?"

"I have had an awful dream," replied Fabian, as he wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

"And what has your confounded dream to do with our appointments?" demanded Andy.

"Listen, Andy, and I will tell you.
Every incident in it was so horribly and painfully real that I can remember it as distinctly as though it had actually occurred. I thought we were out in Java, working together in a beautiful forest, cutting our way through such exquisite flowers and mosses, as I have never seen in my life before. Each step we made trod out such perfume from the blossoming carpet, we were quite intoxicated with the sweets that surrounded us, and the words were singing overhead like Heaven's own orchestra. I fancied we had an appointed task to accomplish and we told on side by side, very happy and contented, until suddenly I missed you.
I looked quickly to see where you had gone, when I caught sight of you in an other part of the forest, cutting your way through bushes and flowers that looked as far as those that surrounded us, but were in reality full of poison and foul juices, and wrapped in by a deadly miasma. I thought I called to you to return, but you took no heed, and presently I saw you approaching a tree around which was coiled a serpent, a huge anaconda, one of the most dangerous of the reptile tribe, and its glistening yellow eyes were fixed upon you.
I couldn't stop you then nor go to you.
I tried to shout your name, but my tongue clung to the roof of my mouth and my limbs seemed paralyzed. All I could do was to watch, in silent horror, your approach to the fatal tree which the anaconda was coiled, ready to spring upon you. And I saw it done Andy! I saw the brute dart across your path and throw you down, and then, as you lay helpless on the ground, I watched it coil its thick body round and round you like a monster rope, and press closer and closer, till your bones cracked and your limbs were crushed, and you could only breathe in short, fifful gasps. And then, at the very last, your eyes caught mine—and I shall never forget their look," continued Fabian, shuddering, and covering his face with his hands. "It was so plainly: "This is your doing, Fabian! You might have prevented this, but you brought me out here, and this is the end of it. Oh, Andy! I shall never forget that look, and if any harm should happen to you in Java, I shall never forgive myself."

"You don't mean to say you are going to attach any importance to a dream?" said his cousin, contemptuously.

"But it was so real—so horribly distinct and real."

"I dare say! So was your supper.
What did you eat last night, Fabian?"

"Nothing but cheese and salad. But don't make game of it like that, Andy.
Think how dear you are to me, and what I should feel if anything happened to you through my means."

"But it would not be through your means. It was Pere Raoul you gave me the appointment—not you!"

"But the dream has been sent to me, Andy, and I cannot believe that is a warning. Shall we wait, dear cousin?
Will you consent to wait for a few months, and know; and if misfortune is to come with riches, we are far better without them."

"I'll be whipped if I'll wait," replied Andy. "You can do as you choose, of course, but our passages are taken and I shall take advantage of the circumstances, if you don't.
Besides which, we have accepted the situation and I don't see how we could back out of them even if we wished to do so."

"Very well," said Fabian, patiently.
"Where you go, Andy, I shall follow, and we will trust the rest to Heaven, but I wish I had never dreamed this dream."

"Don't be a miff," replied the other.
"I don't think you were such an old woman, Fabian, as to care about dreams I'll keep out of the way of the anacondas — if there are such things in Java never fear! and of the forests, too, you may depend upon it. I never was such a fellow for flowers and mosses as you, remember. A comfortable room and a pipe of tobacco are much more in my line, and you won't catch me 'a-gypsy-ing' unless I am actually compelled to it."

"There are worse evils in this world than anacondas," said Fabian, with a sigh. He saw that Andy had no capability of translating his dream except and he was shy of explaining himself further. But though he mentioned the fact of no one that dream weighed on his mind for many a long day afterward—even until it had proved itself a true prophet in its wildest and most horrible sense.

The voyage from Amsterdam to Batavia, notwithstanding Fabian's vac-illate fears, was a happy and prosperous one. The time of year secured them favorable winds and quiet seas; and their little vessel, the Azada, went straight as a dart from one port to another. Our young men suffered, of course, as most inexperienced sea-travellers do, but their fine constitutions and buoyant spirits shook off the mal de mer as readily as was possible, and they were well again and on deck almost before the ship was out of the harbor.
