A Berlin correspondent reports Prince Bismarck saying in conversation that all his moments of real happiness put together would hardly make up twenty-four hours. In politics he never gained enough rest to be happy. His first experience of real happiness was when, as a boy, he shot his first hare, and he subsequently enjoyed life with his wife and children. There is some humor in Bismarck's naive admission that though he loved truth and "tried to stick to it" during his diplomatic career he was now and then obliged to "deviate a trifle from it," and that this was always painful to the old Emperor who loved truth above all things.
