The Woes of Having Many Possessions. (B. C. Forbes in Forbes Magazine.)

My little boys have just suffered a terrible tragedy. This morning they came rushing to me, crying all hysterically. During the night dogs had broken into their rabbit house and killed their pets. The little fellows were inconsolable. They assured me that they had locked them up carefully the previous night—which I knew was as because I happened to have inspected the place. Their grief probably was intensified because I had told them that if they showed they could look after rabbits properly, I would let them have a pony.

What this little boyhood tragedy has brought home to my mind is that possessions bring their responsibilities and, oftentimes woes. Very small children have few possessions and worry little over them. As we grow up we reach out for more and more things. As men, many of us succumb to the temptation to make the accumulation of possessions our main aim and end in life. The more we acquire, the more interest we pile up, the heavier becomes our burden of responsibilities. The more we have, the greater the room for disappointments, for things going wrong.

How wise we would be to look upon material possessions strictly as a means to an end, as a means to the fullest possible development of our better selves.

So Much Depends on the ENTRANCE DOOR which should be of such a character as to reflect welcome, not only to the arriving guest, but to be always attractive to those who use it daily.

our spiritual growth, our good will towards our fellowmen, our human impulses. Regarding and utilizing our possessions in this way, would we not greatly reduce the dangers and the woes attacking to many possessions, and that subtle, spiritual poison, pride of possessions.

Lumber Is Not Passé.
Tallow dies are still manufactured in large quantities, and the American Snuff Company continues to care generous dividends; sabers have not been banished by the blunder-bus nor the Lewis gun; the submarine has not put ships-of-the-line out of commission; and neither suburban trolley lines nor motor trucks have ruined the railroads. And, says Willard C. Howe, editor of "Lumber" in Forbes Magazine (N. Y.), "nothing could be further from the truth than the assumption that substitutes are forcing lumber into the discard."

"Consideration of the new industries of recent years," continues Mr. Howe, "shows that most of them have developed as heavy consumers of lumber. Automobiles, talking machines, airplanes, radio—these and innumerable others have created new demands for forest products. From the time one sits down to breakfast at a table made of wood and picks up the morning paper, printed on wood, through the day and the night, wood is a constant and necessary servant, performing in a thousand ways. Because of the almost infinite variety of the demands for its products, the lumber industry is not, as some suppose, a declining industry. Rather, it is an industry on the threshold of greater things."
