the objects themselves, these objects being singular. But what is the very subject thinking but individual, sensible and singular. Hence by this one subjecting any cannot come from the mind. Very good, but suppose for sake of argument we grant him they come from the mind, the question arises. How are they to be distinguished? Only two ways possible. They may be distinguished by something else or they may come from the very nature of the mind. If the first, then the universal forms come from something which is not the mind, his whole fabric crumbles away.
