

refused to satisfy; and as he grew aged and drew near the confines of another world, a clear light shone upon the path of duty, and he saw that family honour was not to be compared to the establishment and vindication of truth and justice. Then it was that the condition in the will he had made troubled him. It was nothing less, he saw, than a perpetration of that wrong for which his conscience had suffered these years, and constituted an act which carried his sin and its fruits even now he could not speak the words which proclaimed his son a criminal, but he resolved on a compromising course. He would execute another final deed, leaving his property unconditionally to Bridgenorth, and write a paper which should fall into the hands of the latter after his death. This was done, but unfortunately he made Jasper, Jaquin's confidant, give the packet in his charge with the injunction to deliver it up to Bridgenorth on the evening of the day on which he was buried. Also, he neglected to destroy the former will, so that Jaquin had a fatal opportunity to gratify his vindictive hatred of Bridgenorth, and we have seen how ruthlessly he took advantage of the chance.
