Every indication seems to point to a fairly good market tomorrow, the last regular market day before the holiday. It is not thought, however, that the supply of turkeys, or even of other fowl, will be as large as it was yesterday.

The Prices.

On the other hand, it is consoling to think that most of the dealers agree that prices have now reached their limit. Cases, however. One man who held out for 22 cents had his supply left on his hends, and had ultimately to sell for 20 cents. It is not thought that there will be the same demand in future from outside places as there has been lately, so it will be easier for the local people to get what they need. Even at that, however, the supply is not going to be equal to the demand, so those who are wise will turn out an hour earlier than usual to make sure of it.
