BY FREDERICK ORIN BARTLETT.

The word gave birth to a day-dream. He saw himself getting off the train at St. Croix, and walking over the road to the little red schoolhouse. He saw himself waiting outsideu ntil school was over. He saw Julie come out; saw her start at sight of him; saw himself stride towards her. He had not figured in a really dramatic episode for several months now. This appealed to every sense in him. It brought back to him the moment of parting as vividly as though it had been yesterday. It flushed his face and quickened the pace of his heart. He rose and turned down the avenue towards Rooney's. He felt the need of a drink, but at the door he hesitated. He went through his pockets and found go dollar bill which he didn't know he had. This decided him. As he stepped forward he heard a voice:

"Saw shipmate."

"Just round. Oh, ye needn't be afeerd I'm goin' to tank up. See, here's the money."
With some ostentation he counted out his full week's salary before her and tossed it on the bed.

"If I wasn't so sorter tired, I'd go with you, 'Gene,' she said.

"Sleep as late as you can. Don't bother bed and kissed her. With sudden passion she reached up her thin arms and direw his sandy head to her breast.

"Gene,' she whispered, "I ain't never gone ter scold you again, no matter what you does."

"I don't mind," he answered uneasily. "I den't mind," he answered uneasily. "I den't mind," he answered uneasily. "Don't never say that again, 'Gene,' she pleaded.

rward he heard a voice:

"Say, shipmate."
Turning, he found himself confronting bronzed, thick-set man with a parrot on his arm.
"What ye want?" 'Gene questioned with growing interest.
"I'm down an' out," answered the felow. "Give me a half for the bird an' ne's yours. He's worth a fiver if he's "Where'd ye get him?" inquired Gene.

"In South Ameriky. I'm just ashore i' I'm stony broke."
"South America?" exclaimed Gene.
The word acted on him like magic.
"Th' same."

'I'll take him," 'Gene answered quickly same The two passed the doors together and Gene secured change at the bar. Then he reached out eagerly for the bird. The latter sputtered a protest, and as an after-thought he added, "Rio de Janeiro."
"Where he picked up his cussin' is more'n I know," the sailor apologized.

'Gene Comes Home.

'Gene was very happy on the road from Boston to St. Croix. The weather remained fine most of the way, but when it was foul he had no difficulty in finding shelter. There was not a farmer's wife who did not put her best on the table when, with his blue eyes brightening in his bronzed face, he asked for food in return for work. Sometimes the farmer himself, to the disgust of his wife as a rule, insisted upon actual work in payment, and when this was the case 'Gene worked cheerfully enough. But more often than not he was received as a welcome passer-by, for when questioned he was ready with stories of the tropics which made the eyes of his listeners grow big in wonder. More than one farmer's lass went to bed hugging close the memory of this brave adventurer as her hero. At first he told his tale in a spirit of fun, but as he watched its effect and saw how Among the many advertisements apearing in the volume, which are visble links with the past, are those of John Erskine, merchant; Scatcherd & Meredith, solicitors; C. C. Abbott, solicitor; Parkyn & Atkinson, of Ailsa Craig, grain and produce merchants; D. Shoff, lumber merchant; Wm. Livingston, of Delaware broker and conveyancer; Hodgins & Rocke, of Lucan, lumber merchants; Edward Thompson, of Strathroy, hardware merchant; J. & O. McClary, stove founders of London; of this brave adventurer as her hero-first he told his tale in a spirit of fun, but as he watched its effect and saw how readily it was believed, he grew serious until he half believed the narrative him-self. It wasn't his fault that he had D. C. McDonald, solicitor. A History of Middlesex.
