

had wished for peace, the next greatest blessing to freedom which men could possess; but since war has been declared, he who could wish otherwise than for his country's victory, who would not sacrifice his fortune and his blood to defend the national independence, was a most miserable coward.

He told us it would be no ordinary war; it mean freedom or slavery for men; everlasting injustice or every one's rights; the greatness of France or her degradation. He told us not to believe that all would be over in a day, but to husband our strength and our resolution for years to come; that despots were about to send against us all their poor soldiers, brought up in ignorance and in respect for privileges; and instead of embracing we should shed torrents of blood, and fight till death.

"But," said he, "he who defends his right by force is just; he who seeks to raise himself above the rights of others is criminal; justice, then, is on our side."

He told us, moreover, that this war on our side would not be a war of soldiers, but a war of citizens; that we should fight our enemies, not only with guns and bayonets, but with reason, good sense, and good feeling; that we could offer them good and evil at the same time; and dull as they were said to be, these nations would at last understand that they were defending their own chains and collars against those who came to break them; then they would bless us and rally to us, and the rights of all be founded on the basis of eternal justice. He called that a war of propaganda, wherein good books, good speeches, offers of peace, alliances and advantageous treaties would march in the advanced guard in company with the rights of man.
