No he is only getting under the dormer for protection from the heat of the merciless fire which is creeping with horrid and sure pace down the shingles. Again he starts for the eave and corners, and as a hundred voices cry, "For God's sake keep back a moment," "We'll give you a ladder," he thrusts his legs over the edge of the cornice, the body follows, the iron-nerved fingers grasp the ends of the shingles, and the toes touch the bar of a sash of the upper story windows. Down goes the and a hold is obtained, and the blood spurts from an artery severed by the glass, the man steadies himself, clings for life to the window, and then lowers his body to the top rung of a ladder, where strong arms await him. The man is Joseph Bourgeois, of Shediac, who has thus escaped a frightful death. He was hurried to Dr. Holden's office where it was found the glass had severed the main rrtery of the right wrist, from which the blood flowed in jets, but was soon staunched and bound up.
