Select Poetry

THE LOVING FATHER.

O, the bitter buds we eat,

And the crimson within;

O, the weary, weary feet,

And the weary, weary feet.

While the Father's house is hilled,

With the better food to spare;

While the fatted calf is killed,

And the garment ready there.

Worldly gain, ambition, pride,

How we strive to grasp them all!

Yet the soul, unatisfied,

Tastes, and finds each one but gall.

Far from home, each setting sun

Finds us longing for its peace;

And each to-morrow day begun

Brings us thoughts of sweet release.

If we heard the Father say,

"I am waiting, weary child;"

If we knew that on the way

He would meet us reconciled;

That His arms would clasp us there,

And His tears fall fast with ours,

Would we linger to prepare,

Or to gather faded flowers?

Son, arise! cast off thy rage,

Even now He waits for thee,

While thy weary, weary feet

Find the better food to spare.

Canst thou slight such gracious care?

Canst thou turn from love so great?

Just in sight of home so dear!

Will thou wander desolate?

Interesting Story

A SIMPLE KINDNESS.

(CONCLUDED)

"Hungry," added Sara, building

her self into the kitchen to tea

and toast.

"It must be the right thing to stay

with mother the girl said to herself,

"and so I must stay."

Help came on Monday afternoon

with a new customer, who brought a costly and elaborate costume to be made; which was almost a wonder

she would trust into the hands of a young dressmaker of whom she had just heard.

"And, Miss May, I should like to pay a part of my bill in advance—if you can make a rough estimate—and the remainder when the work is done.

Nay, I insist, especially in these various times when I shall have to get you to get on my feet.

"What a help that was to the girl!

Now she could pay Sara. Then, too,

her mother could have as many delicious as she wanted.

"Oh, Sara," she cried, after the lady

had gone, "I am so glad that you had done it! And I am so glad that you had done it! I shall never forget it."

And after that, through all the travels, work came in quite plentifully.

Mrs. Merriam recommended her dressmaker to others, and Edith had more than her hands could do.

"I don't understand it! I don't understand it!" she said to Sara sometimes. She never once thought of the simple kindness

she had done for her.

But in the spring Mrs. Merriam grew worse, and Edith had to let her work go. It was a great blow to her, and she

might just as well have lost her money.

At first she tried to get up the work and dress in a few days, but

she found that she was not strong enough to do it. She finally gave up the idea, and she ordered that her whole time, night and day, might be devoted to the quarterous invalid. And so, quickly, the little money saved through the winter

began to melt away.

"And you will let me help you,"

she said to Sara.

"Not so long as I have the money,"

returned the girl.

"But, my darling, the time is coming when what you have will be gone.

Will you come to me then? You lose me well enough to be willing to let me help you, my own?"

"Yes, Sara," she said.

"You promise?"

"Yes, Sara."

A few days later she asked him, and his face turned white. He caught her up in his arms, and he said to her

in a hoarse voice:

"Oh! my own, would I could suffer
