That is just what they say of Vapo-Cresolene. The vaporizer is practically indestructible, and the Cresolene is certainly not expensive. This way of treating affections of the throat is most economical, and is also most effective. Our little picture illustrates how it's used. You put some Cresolene in the vaporizer, light lamp beneath, and then breathe-in the soothing, healing vapor. For whooping-cough and croup it's a perfect specific.

CECIL RHODES' AIM.

HE DREAMED OF A GREAT WORLD'S SECRET TRUST.

The Philosophy of the Man's Life—His Scheme for Universal Peace Among the Nations Unfolded to Mr. W. T. Stead—Warns the British of Wanting Time—He Voices a Grand Idea and Tells the Lesson of Home Rule.

A remarkable document, being nothing less than the political will and private builder, was given to the press on April 9 by William T. Stead, the close friend of the great Imperialist. Mr. Stead's article, "Cecil Rhodes' Secret Trust," which follows, sets forth Rhodes' most aims, and consists of a free, powerful, explanation of Rhodes' views on the United States and Great Britain.

It was written by Rhodes to Stead in 1890 as a summary of a long conversation held between himself and Stead.

In its three columns of complex sentences the whole philosophy of Mr. Rhodes' international and individual life is embraced. Perhaps it can best be summarized as an argument in favor of the organization of a secret society on the lines of the Jesuit order, for the promotion of the peace and welfare of the world, and the establishment of an American-British federation, with absolute home rule for the component parts.

It was written by himself to W. T. Stead in 1890. For originality and breadth of thought it eclipses even the most famous will, yet it is merely a collection of disjointed ideas, hurriedly put together by the Colossus as a summary of a long conversation held between himself and Stead.

"I am a bad writer," said Rhodes in one part of what might be called his confessions, "but through my ill-connected sentences you can trace the lay of my ideas, and you can give my idea the literary clothing that is necessary."

But Mr. Stead wisely refused to edit or dress it up, saying: "I think the public will prefer to have the rough, hurried, and sometimes ungrammatical notes exactly as Mr. Rhodes scribbled them off, rather than have them supplied with literary clothing by anybody else."

Mr. Rhodes commenced by declaring that the "key" to his idea for the development of the English speaking race was the foundation of a "society copied, as to organization, from the Jesuits." Commenced with "a differential rate and a copy of the United States Constitution is home rule, or federation. An organization formed on these lines in the House of Commons, constantly working for decentralization and not wasting time on trivial questions, would, Mr. Rhodes believed, soon settle the all-important question of markets for the products of the Empire.

"The labor question," he wrote, "is important, but that is deeper than labor. America, both in its possibilities of alliance and its attitude of commercial rival, was apparently ever present in Mr. Rhodes' mind. 'The world with America in the forefront,' he wrote, 'is devising tariffs to boycott our manufactures. This is the supreme question. I believe that England, with fair play, should manufacture for the world, and being a free trader, I believe that, until the world comes to its senses, you should declare war (I mean a commercial war), with these trying to boycott our manufactures. That is my program. You might finish the war by a union with America, and universal peace after a hundred years.'"

But toward this millennium Mr. Rhodes believed the most powerful factor would be "a secret society, organized like Lovell's, supported by the accumulated wealth of those whose aspirations is a desire to do 'something.' And who are regarded the 'hideous amovance' daily regarded by the thought as to which 'of their incompetent relations' they should leave their fortune. These wealthy people, Mr. Rhodes thought, would thus be greatly relieved, and be able to turn their attention to inherited gains to some advantage." Reverting to himself, Mr. Rhodes said: "It is a fearful thought to feel you possess a patent, and to doubt whether your life will last you through the circumlocution of the patent office. I have that inner conviction that if I can live I have thought out something that is worthy of being registered in the patent office. The fear is, shall I have time and opportunity, and I believe, with all the enthusiasm bred in the soul of an inventor, that it is not self-glification that I desire, but the wish to live and register my patent for the benefit of those who, I think, are the greatest people the world has ever seen, but whose fault is that they do not know their strength, their greatness, or their destiny, but who are wasting their time in minor or local matters. Even a Laborer who possesses no sentiment should be taught that the labor of England is dependent on the outside world, and that as far as I can, the outside world, if he does not look out, will neglect the result of English labor."

"Half-Blooded."

"Half-Blooded," or Mr. T. A. Browne, as he is in real life, has just resigned the Presidency of the Australian Literature Society on the advice of his doctor, says The London Chronicle. He is in his seventeenth year, and until about six months ago was in the enjoyment of remarkably robust health for a man of his age. He is a Wesson man by birth, but as a boy of ten he accompanied his father, to Australia, where he was destined to a career of a hundred years. He is now living in his most fashionable home, and goes around in a sedan chair of half a million inhabitants. He was in early life a squatter, worth a quarter of a million; then came a succession of disastrous troubles, and he was a ruined man. Entering the Government service as a stipendiary Magistrate and Goldfields Warden, he devoted his leisure hours to his study. Half a dozen of his treatises have been published, and he has been discovered by a man in 1888.

Instructions were given to the officers of the present, I received by which ran as or to your that (1) I tail-coat I should be dressed in a tuxedo, and I should be dressed in a tuxedo.
