ANNABEL OR THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXV. TAKEN CAPTIVE.

It was all done so quickly that Philip who was roused by the report of Steive's rifle, had not opened his bewildered eyes in time to see the disappearing form of the savage, and could not understand the cause of alarm. This, however, was soon explained to him, amid self-accusations from Jim, who loudly took upon himself the blame of what had happened.

"Wall," observed Steive, philosophicaly, "I guess it ain't no use crying over spilt milk. I ain't a-going to say that the escape of that 'ere Ingin is of no consequence, 'cause I believe something different. Only, if we make tracks in time I hope as how we shall keep ahead. I'd advise, therefore, that we move at once."

The propriety of this advice was too obvious to be disputed. To loiter where they were was to bring the Indians the sooner upon them, for without doubt the savage who had just escaped would communicate as soon as possible with others of his tribe, and a pursuit would commence, the danger from which was to be obviated only by their ability to keep in advance. Steive knew better than to expect the redskins to be eluded, for the three could not proceed through the forest without leaving a trail, and this, however faint, the Indians would assuredly discover, and follow with unerring directness. Speed alone would save them, and to this they must now trust. So, without staying even to partake of breakfast, they started, and, under the trapper's skillful guidance, made such progress that by noon they considered they had got well beyond the reach of the party behind, and might look upon themselves as pretty safe, unless they should chance to cross the path of other Indians.

As yet Steive had said nothing about the two white men he had seen accompanying the Indians; but now he mentioned it, and expressed his wonder that one of them should be Gomez, the half-breed, whom he had never known to go any distance from the Canadian frontier. "It beats me hollow," he said, "to think what he can be doing so far west as Kentucky, and with the Chickasaws on the warpath. There's some devilish mischief afoot, that's all, and it's uncommon like as if it meant harm to some of the white settlements on the Kentucky river. Guess I'd like to find it out, and spill it, too, if I could. What makes the thing more amazin' is that I know Gomez was in Montreal when we left."

"And the other white man—who could he be?" questioned Philip. "Couldn't guess no more nor a monkey," returned the trapper. "He looked bad enough for anything—thick made, short necked, with hair as rough as a grizzly bear."

"Ha," cried Philip, with a sudden start, "that description applies to the man who was always present at my interviews with Yorke, and who seemed to take an uncommon interest in my inquiries after Jerry Just."

"Snakes and niggers, you don't say so!" cried Steive, with quite a burst of energy. "There's the road to daylight," he rapidly added. "It's Jerry's settlement they are making for, and the business is Yorke's. Now what on earth does he mean harm to Jerry for?"

"They had an old quarrel." "In course they had, but that is years ago. Jerry told me about it. He had found out that Yorke was skinning him and robbing the merchant in England whose agency he had, so no sooner did Jerry get proof of this than he took his furs to another market. The thing got wind, and Yorke was clawed up."
