The Secret Out.

Her story as volunteered to him and doubtless to the coroner before him, was as follows:

Mildred Farley was an orphan, her widowed mother having died about a month before in the very house and in the very room which she herself was occupying at the time of her own untime-This mother was a very attractive woman of the gentle, retiring type, whose melancholy eyes told of a life of mingled love and sorrow. Her daughter, who had appeared to idolize her, sacrificed everything to her comfort, and it was mainly on account of this mother's ill-health that Mildred worked so hard at a trade manifestly beneath her capacity and breeding. For Mrs. Farley had been brought up in luxury, and had many wants which could only be satisfied by means greater than those usually acquired by a young girl in Mildred's position. But work and self-denial will do much, and Mrs. Farley never had any reason to complain. Nor with her death had Mildred's exertions ceased. Though the necessity for such severe labor seemed to be past, she had shown no disposition to indulge herself. From early morning till late at night she had sat at her work, finishing one beautiful dress after another, till Mrs. Olney was fain to believe that she had some new object in view, and would ere long unite her fortunes with those of her fellowboarder, the doctor.

But though the young people were to all appearances very good friends, meeting constantly at table and frequently in the parlors as well, the anxious landlady was soon assured by the physician's abstracted and reticent air, and as she thought by Mildred's uniform look of indifference, that her fend desire was not to be realized. When, therefore, Mildred informed her one morning that she was going away for a little visit, the good woman never thought of the doctor in connection with her departure, nor did she then or afterwards harbor any suspicion that her bright young boarded was contemplating marriage with anyone, least of all with him. For if this busy girl had broken in upon her usual habits, he had not, nor was there anything in his bearing or conversation to lead her to suppose that he meditated any change in his mode of life.

of their proposed with all the tragic developments which had immediately ensued, had, there-fore, awakened in the whole household the greatest feeling of surprise; nor could Mrs. Olney, for one, realize that the young and blooming girl upon whom the labor and sorrows of the last few months had left scarcely a trace, had succumbed in a moment to the temptation of suicide, no matter by what sickness she had been seized.

"I know that folks are taken dreadful sudden sometimes," the old lady remarked at this juncture. "But I can-not reconcile such an end with what I knew of Mildred. It isn't in keeping with her character. If she had loved the doctor more or hated him more I could perhaps have understood it. But she was healthy, body and soul, a frank, young, hopeful girl, and I don't see—" She said no more, but her lips took a grim line, and Mr. Gryce perceived that his suspicions, vague as they were, were not altogether unshared by this warm-hearted woman and true friend of Mildred Farley.

He therefore started with good hope upon a line of questions by which he expected to reach some clue that would help him to the end he felt rather than saw before him. But though his skill was great, the result was meagre, and after a lengthened conversation the only facts he thought worth recording in his mind were these:

That there had certainly been something peculiar in the young girl's actions of late; a certain reticence about her work, for instance, such as she had never before displayed. Though she had made several handsome dresses during the last month (as the scraps lying about her room sufficiently testfied), she had never shown them to her landlady, as she had previously been accustomed to do, but kept herself and them locked up in her room till the time came for taking them home. And yet these dresses were certainly for other people and not for herself, she having been seen carrying them out in a great box many times during the four weeks she had kept herself such a prisoner. That the person for whom they were destined was rich, for she came several times to be fitted, and always in a

That the place to which Mildred had gone on a visit was not known to her landlady, nor, as far as could be learned, to anyone else in the house. That Mildred was invariably well, and had never to all appearances stood in need of a doctor's prescription. That Dr. Molesworth had been Mrs. Farley's physician, and in this way had seen much of the daughter. But that he had never appeared to take advantage of this fact, nor could Mrs. Olney recall the least token of an existing affection between them. If lovers, they had been very circumspect, too circumspect, as it now appeared; such seeming indifference could cover nothing That contrary to their usual open relations they had been seen just once whispering together on the stairs. But even then it was not as lovers whisper -rather like persons who have some business to settle. That no one in the house ever linked their names together in speaking of them; nor were they ever the subject of jokes among the boarders. A poor array of seemingly unproductive facts, it is true; but Mr. Gryce was not discouraged. It was from some chance word or petty revelation he expected his ciue, not from the open details which everyone knew.

His next interview was with the woman who had come with the coroner and whom he as well as Harrison, recognized as an expert female detec-tive. She had taken Mrs. Olney's place beside the dead girl, and from her he hoped to gather a fact about which he was very anxious. "Well, Mrs. Roberts," he said, upon seeing her, "did you get the line I sent you?" "I did, sir."

"And what have you to say?" "That you are all right. There is a mark of fresh paint on the back of her gown between the shoulder blades." Mr. Gryce drew a breath expressive of great satisfaction. "I thought so," he cried. "And what was its color, Mrs.

Roberts; to a shade, mind?" "As near as I could judge in the light I had, it was brown, but of a very bright and peculiar tint." "Right again. I am very much obliged to you, very much obliged to you. Does anyone else know about this spot?"

"Not to my knowledge." Very good; it is immaterial. 'Twill take more than one of us to discover where that paint came from, imagine. "Any more questions, sir?" What do you think of Dr.

Molesworth?" "A brooding, dark-browed man, with something on his mind beside grief. I cannot make him out, but this much is certain: You won't get anything out of him till the law makes him speak. He is never off his guard, and will neither make a slip nor forget his dignity. Indeed, I have begun to admire him in the short space of time we have been in the same room."

"Humph! And do you think other women likely to share that sentiment?"
"Yes, sir; I understand what you mean, and I say unequivocally, yes. He is a man without one handsome feature; he is also a man without much softness of soul or appreciation of woman, but he has a dangerous eye, and you will find if you search his history close enough, that more than one woman has been broken against his hard rature. I know the sex, and I know the men dangerous to it, and he is not one of the least." Mr. Gryce was astonished. Dr. Molesworth was the last man he would have thought likely to be agreeable to women -a conclusion which shows, as he afterwards said to himself, how wise it is now and then to take a woman into one's confidence.

"You probably think, then," he remarked, "that it was love which drove Mildred Farley to her death But Dr. Molesworth expressly said in my presence, she had chosen death in preference to marriage." "He did? Well, Dr. Molesworth should know. I would trust his judg-ment in such matters implicitly." "Would you trust your life with him if he were angry?" "O, now you want to make use of my woman's intuition. I cannot allow you to, sir, the matter is too serious. Stick to facts, Mr. Gryce, no man can handle them better."

He smiled as he turned away. "And is not woman's intuition a fact?" he asked. "I have usually found it so."

THRILLING RESCUE!

A Lad Who Had Fallen Into a Railroad Tunnel Saved by the Cool Action of a Young Man

(From the New York World.) Half a dozen boys were playing on top of the walls of the New York Central tunnel at One hundred and Twentieth street yesterday, daring each other to feats of bravery. The tunnel at that point is open, and the extensive work of raising the tracks offered am-ple opportunity for the boys to display their daring.

Frank Lawrence, 12 years old, of No. 1.688 Park avenue, while leading his companions, fell from the wall and struck his head on the tracks twenty feet below. The fall rendered him unconscious, and he lay in the narrow space between the west track and the tunnel wall, with his feet across the

Half a mile down the long tunnel a train could be seen approaching. The boys screamed in fright, and a crowd ran up. There was no way of getting into the tunnel nearer than One Hundred and Fifteenth street, where steps lead down. Several persons started on the run for that place, but in a moment the train dashed by. It was on the east track, but coming from another direction could be seen the fast express approaching on the track on which young

Lawrence lay. There was a cry of despair from the crowd. One cool-headed young man, Frank Fletcher, of Park avenue and One Hundred and Sixteenth street, knew where there was a rope, and he went for it as soon as he saw the boy's

There was no time to lose when he got back. Hastily tying a noose around his body, he called to the people to lower him into the tunnel. Just as he landed by the side of the unconscious boy, a warning shout came from above, and Fletcher saw that the express was almost upon him.

Freeing himself from the nooze, he picked up the lad and jumped to the east track. As he did so, the train whizzed past, almost drawing him under the wheels with its tremendous suction in the tunnel. Fletcher tied the the rope around young Lawrence and he was hauled up. Then it was lowered again, and the rescuer was lifted up amid great cheering.

Lawrence was attended by Dr. Page, of No. 17 East One Hundred and Twentieth street, who found that his jaw had been fractured and numerous other bruises received. The boy was taken home and did not recover consciousness for several hours.
