oth Toch and Bouvier a part of what both Toch and Bouvier a part of what he owed them.
Police Detectives George Radford and Rogers went with Mr. Toch to his office, where they found Gamgee and Bouvier. The forged note was shown to Mr. Bouvier, and he was asked where he got it. He said he had received it as a private loan from Mr. Brown, who was a personal friend. When his attention was called to the fact that the ink in which the note was filled out was the same as that then on the table, he said that he had himself filled out the note and forwarded it to Mr. Brown for his signature. A scrap of paper lay upon the signature. A scrap of paper lay upon the "Won't you please give me your address?" said Detective Radford, handing Mr. Bouvier a pen. "And also let me have Mr. Brown's address," he added. Mr. Bouvier wrote the names and handed the paper to the detective. The writing of Mr. Brown's name corresponded exactly with the name signed to the note. There had been no attempt in the forgery to imitate

Mr. Brown's signature.

Detective Radford then took Bouvier, Detective Radford then took Bouvier, Gamgee and Toch before Justice Kilbreth at the Tombs. Mr. Gamgee explained that he owed Toch money for chemicals, and Bouvier for his patent ice machine. Mr. Bouvier, who had pressed him for money, proposed that Mr. Gamgee indorse the note, discount it, and pay the proceeds to Toch and Bouvier. Justice Kilbreth remanded Bouvier for further examination on Tuesday. Messrs. Gamgee and Toch were manded Bouvier for further examination of Tuesday. Mcssrs. Gamgee and Toch were discharged, the Justice being satisfied that they had acted in good faith. On his way to police headquarters Bou-vier spoke of his daughter, recently mar-ried, and of his family, and said that he felt more for the pain they would suffer than for his own discomfort. He did not, how-ever, acknowledge the forgery. He said that he had expected the note would be quietly accepted and discounted, and would not be bandied about from one note dealer to another. He said he would have bee to another. He said he would have been able to pay the note himself at the end of ninety days had Mr. Brown refused it.

At police headquarters the prisoner said he was an inventor, 48 years old. His penknife was taken from him, and he was locked in a cell, the second to the right in the main corridor. This was about 4 p.m. At 6 o'clock he ate a hearty dinner. Almost opposite his cell is a cell in which two detectives on watch always sleep. Detectives Weinberg and Handy occupied this on Monday night. Doorman Luther, who has charge of the prison at night, is an infirm charge of the prison at night, is an infirm charge of the prison at night, is an infirm old man. It appears that this rule is not regarded regularly, and that the aged doorman did not visit Bouvier's cell between midnight and 6 a. m.
