confent of the parties. There is therefore no way left to effect an union of force between the two countries, confistent with the folemn furrender to America of the rights of the purfe and of the fword, but upon the principles of fæderal alliance.

If I could have had my choice of all the arguments in the world, to support the proposition of giving an offer of peace to America. upon the condition of the eventual treaty of alliance between France and America being relinquished, I would have taken those very arguments, from the letter of the Commissioners just now cited. The Commissioners have, to every substantial effect, fully acknowledged the independence of America. The proposition, therefore, which I have flated, is only supplementary to this, viz. If America is to become fubflantially independent of Great-Britain, let them be independent of France and of all the world. Agreed, fay the Commissioners, if we can but fettle this point of the union of force; and all that we require is, "that the extent of " our future connection should be determined upon the principles "of mere reason, and confiderations of mutual interest, on which " we are likewife willing to reft the permanence of any arrange-"ments we may form." The answer then is shortly this: If America, as the condition of peace, can prevail with the court of France to relinquish the eventual treaty of alliance, they will then be free to act as the principles of mere reason, and as the confiderations of mutual interest fhall guide them, which is all that the parliamentary commissioners require. The commissioners have, in the most argumentative and explicit manner, abdicated every other claim, and reft all the future connection with America, and the permanence of any fuch future connection, upon the confiderations of mere reason and mutual interest.

What then have we left to fight for? Every national intereft, and all parliamentary claims, have been relinquifhed by ministers long ago. Even that flumbling-block of independence is now fwept away. Ministers do not contend, on the part of their country, for any future claim of rights over America. The utmost extent now proposed by them for any future onnection with America, is to be determined upon principles of mere reason and confiderations of mutual interest. If these are their real principles, why have they not, and why do they not proceed upon the broad
