IT HAS MADE TROUBLE FOR THE KAISER.

Conservatives Turn on Ruler Because of Alsace and Lorraine Legislatures

A MODERN BATTLEFIELD.

Strategists Figure That an Area of 150,000 Square Miles Would be Required to Fight 20th Century Battle Between Two Great Powers

(Times Special Correspondent.)

Berlin, Sept. 26.—One of the features of the summer in Germany has been a series of more or less veiled attacks on the emperor, not by the socialists or other democratic elements, but by the extreme reactionary conservatives, who represent the interests of the great Prussian land-owners.

The conservatives in Germany are not merely opposed to every kind of political and social progress, but they are actually retrograde in their tendencies, inasmuch as it is their desire to abolish manhood suffrage, whereby the deputies of the imperial legislature are now elected, and to sweep away such slight traces of constitutional government as already exist. They hold about seventy seats in the Reichstag, out of a total of 397, but their numerical strength does not adequately represent their real power in the country.

The ruling caste is predominantly conservative, and conservatives hold the most important administrative posts in the government service, so that their influence is enormous. As a rule, they make a great parade of their loyalty to the Kaiser and of their devotion to the crown, but just now they are bitterly discontented with the trend of affairs and are venting their displeasure on the emperor.

An innovation introduced by the imperial government has incurred their hostile criticism. The recent bestowal of constitutional government on the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, which were conquered from France in the great war of 1870 and which since their acquisition by Germany have been administered as crown lands, meaning that they have had no voice in the control of their own affairs, is what started all the trouble.

WAR IN THE EAST.

and a quarter soldiers would be a comparatively small one in up-to-date warfare, for forces of this numerical strength took the field so long ago as the Franco-German campaign in 1870, since when marvelous developments in military matters have ensued.

In a struggle between two European military powers, it is quite possible and, indeed, probable, that each of the opposing forces would number something like three million troops, for Germany, France, Russia, and Austria-Hungary are all capable of sending such armies to the front without touching their respective last lines of reserves. If two such mighty armies were engaged in battle the field of their operations would number something like three million troops, for Germany, France, Russia, and Austria-Hungary are all capable of sending such armies to the front without touching their respective last lines of reserves. If two such mighty armies were engaged in battle the field of their operations would number something like three million troops, for Germany, France, Russia, and Austria-Hungary are all capable of sending such armies to the front without touching their respective last lines of reserves.

When Frederick the Great fought his battles in the eighteenth century the field of operations never exchanged more than four miles from side to side, and in the Russo-Japanese war, when, owing to the great distance from the respective bases, there were never more than three or four hundred thousand troops simultaneously in action, the battlefields remained limited in extent.

Will the generals of the future be equal to the almost superhuman task of directing operations extending over such immense areas? Every army must have a commander in chief and that generalissimo must control the movements of all the troops under his orders. He will have all the latest technical devices at his disposal. Hundreds of miles of telegraph and telephone wires will be rapidly laid in order that he may exchange orders and communications with his auxiliary officers.

There will be motor cars and flying machines, steerable balloons and spherical balloons, bicycles, and apparatus for wire less telegraphy and telephony, besides other mechanical contrivances for signalling. Will these suffice to surmount the purely technical difficulties involved in establishing effective communication over such vast areas, especially as they will have to be installed and equipped for service in a very short space of time? And if they furnish a perfect communicating machine will there be any human brain capable of mentally digesting the information supplied him with bewildering speed from so many different sources and of working out its mind the profoundly complex problems connected with the movements of such legions of human engines of war?

Would Moltke, the greatest strategist of modern times, if he were alive, be able to handle modern armies of millions with the ease and celerity necessary to success? Are the great armies created by the leading countries of Europe really efficient in the instruments of war, or would the complicated machinery break down under the stress of actual hostilities?

All these questions are occupying the minds of German experts, but only a very small group of them are actually being asked. There is, however, a strong inclination among many competent judges to regard the countless legions of the great powers as inefficient because it is thought that they are too big and unwieldy to be handled with facility, and because of the brain cent nervous difficulties of directing their movements with precision.

War on the Hat Fielder
German society women and favorite actresses—who between them make and unmake fashions in Germany—have leagued together to do away with bird of paradise feathers and other military trappings derived from winged creatures. The movement is led by Professor Schilling, a famous African explorer, and he has secured the support of the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Princess Marie Alexandrine of Russia, Princess Fritzi Masaryk, the uncrowned queen of German musical comedy, and a number of other ladies all potent in the realm of "chic."
