presented one of them to England. Deep offence has been given to the Orangemen of Ireland by the following-passage from Mr. Gladatone's recent speech at St. James' Hall:—"The case of the Turk is this—and we can understand it by looking nearer home—we have first a difference of race; we have next a difference of religion; and that is not all—perhaps it is not the chief part; —we have a difference of race and religion complicated with a third difference more important still—that of unrestrained political ascendancy. Now, gion complicated with a third difference more important still—that of unrestrained political ascendancy. Now, depend upon it, when you combine these three influences, you put the accendant class in a condition in which it is impossible for them to resist corruption and the abuses of corruption. We had something like it—and yet I am almost ashamed to call it like—but it bore a faint analogy, and I hope I shall not be understood to show it further—something like it in what was once the position of the Orangeman in Ireland. The Orangeman of Ireland had a certain amount of difference of race, and also had a certain amount of difference of religion, and he had political ascendancy very considerably, though regulated and restrained by law, and in that respect his case was totally different from that of the Turk, who is practically unrestrained by law. And yet in the case of Ireland, which a hundred years ago we all look back upon with shape we admit that it was inwited the control of the most spritually minded in this congregation, and with shape we admit that it was inwited the control of the most spritually with shape we admit that it was inwited to the control of the processor in the Gospel who will stand by the academical dress, and therefore best of the Evanglical clergy ever to occupy his pulpit. He does more. He shakes the centi-cal questions arise: Outlet in Sielley to use pressure to circumscribe the liberty and this clergy, planily secured to the inverse or the side of the liberty and the side of the black gows. I hold that the clergymen gratuitously to surrender their liberty, and outlet the interior and to yield to Episcopeal pressure to circumscribe the liberty and outlet with a litery, planily secured to surrender their liberty, and outlet with a side of the black gows. I hold that the clergymen gratuitously to surrender their liberty and to yield to Episcopeal pressure to circumscribe the liberty and outlet with side of the liberty and to yield to Episcopeal pressure to circumscribe the liberty and out yet in the case of Ireland, which a hundred years ago we all look back upon with shame, we admit that it was intolerable. Indeed, there are many of us who would say that if at that time there had been any tolerably clean handed power able to interfere and right the wrongs of Ireland it would have deserved the gratitude of mankind."
