ding him farewell.

"I hever thought to have seen you again," she continued, in the same low, passionate voice. "There are lines on your face and round your lips that tell me you have suffered. You will never know in this world that I have knelt by your side and looked into your face—that I have whispered words of parhot to you, but you will know it in heaven. Clive, you will know that I took back my cruel curse, and in heaven's name forgave you."

Her head sunk on his breast, and as she lay there a bright golden sunbeam came in at the window and played round them, touching his white face and making an aureole of glory round her.

The warm sunbeam seemed to rouse her. She raised her head and gased about her with a dazed, dreamy air. She had evidently for the time forgotten all present things. She rose and turned to leave him. When she reached the door she looked back, gave a low, moaning ory, and fell with her face on the ground.

"I knew," said Jane Lewis, when she answered my hasty summons, "that she was not strong anough for it; but she would do it. As though she had not suffered enough!"

It was not for many minutes that merciful oblivion lasted. I was compelled well formed, and elegant rather that the pleasure of speaking." I have not athrocked to whom I have the pleasure of speaking." I have not athrocked to while will sake the will sake the will sake asked, after a short time.

"Yes; you were brought to the River "Yes; you were brought to the River House, near Daintree," I replied. "The mistress of the house saw the accident, and ordered you to be brought here."
"Are you the mistress?" he asked.
"No. Miss Vane lives here. It is to "No. Miss Vane lives here. It is to her you are in lebted, not to me."

"Miss Vane," he repeated, indifferently; the name was evidently not familiar to him. "And you?" he interregated.

"I am Mrs. Neville, Miss Vane's "The name was byness. My reply was abrupt."

"I do not like her at all, Miss Vane."
"The you not? She is beautiful, I sup-

And then I went upstairs with Lewis, who was almost as confused and embarrassed as her mistress.

"Of all the wonderful things to happen!' she said, wringing her hands "It is stranger than a romance, Mrs. Neville. If you only knew!"

"Lewis," I said, "Miss Vane wished to see our patient."

"Because some ridioults."

"Because some ridioults." "Lewis," I said, "Miss Vane wished to see our patient."

Her face grew pale, and her eyes opened wide
"Miss Vane wishes to see Lord Wyntam?" sho repeated. "It is impossible!"
"It is true; sne desires to see him, but she does not wish him to recognize her. I have suggested that she should areas herself in some of your clothes. Will you help her?"
"Ah! poor lady, that I will. My poor mistress! This will kill her—my poor lady!"
So, meaning and lamenting, the faith-"
"Because some ridiculous country clotter has told this worthy woman that am to be kept quiet, she refuses to answer me any questions. I was not injured in the accident—I was merely struned; and I want to know where I nih."
"You are at River House," I replied; "and Kiver House is near Daintree." "To whom does River House belong?" she asked, more graciously.
"It is the residence of Miss Vane," I should like to see her then, to thank her."
"Pardom me, Lady Wynton, Miss Vane Wynton goes," I said, surprised.
She looked at me in real, unaffected

"Look at me, Mrs. Neville. You must see that I am not strong—that I am even consumptive, that is why I live al ways in the south of France. I enjoy my life so much that I do not care to lose to show you all hospitality until Lord Wynton has quite recovered. Pray do not think of leaving him."

Again came that strange laugh.
"Does he know that I am here?"

she was not strong enough for it; but she would do it. As though she had not suffered enough!"

It was not for many minutes that merciful oblivion lasted. I was compelled to intrust her to Lewis and remain with Lord Wynton.

On the doctor's return he pronounced him much better. Again he asked if he would have another professional man; but, remembering our peculiar circumstances, I said:—

"No, we will do without one."

"Lord Wynton will recover," said the Fletcher: "I have no foar now. But he will sequire great pare and attention for some days."

Not long afterward I had the satisfaction of seeing my patient unclose his eyes and of hearing him speak in a low volce. His first conscious action was to a lady; no matter what her tastes or position, she lacked the resteement and good breeding of an English gentlewoman. Still I was bound to comply with her wishes.
