

deavored to delineate for my young readers the part which a Catholic boy is called upon to act in society, and have shown to the best of my ability the beneficial results which may accrue from the fulfilment of his duty, not only as regards himself, but those who are unhappily wandering in the wilderness without the pale of the Church. I have sought to place Religion before the youthful reader as she really is, mild, and cheerful, and softening in her influence. Would that I could but paint her even one half as lovely as she is, and the portrait would suffice to attract and attach the young to her service !

THE END.
