NLIKE an English village, a Mora vian village is an autonomous whole.
It has its own Mayor and Council, ccupation, a self-supporting system. The the one side, an artisan class, comprising the ordinary needs of a self-supporting community, and, on the other, a class of labourers, though they consist mainly of crofters who do not exclusively depend on outside work. Farm labourers in the English sense of the word there are none because the hired hands, mostly young fellows and girls, who are in service only until they marry, are treated as part and parcel of the household. Additionally to their board and lodging, they receive in money only about £6 a year—girls a little to cover the cost of their clothes and boots. The surplus, if any, along with a regular gratuity every Sunday - abou fourpence, but on occasion liberally inas pocket-money.

As is seen, there seems to be still a lingering shade of patriarchism in the relation between master and servant. But it would be a mistake to suppose that the spirit of caste is on that account ah. the spirit of caste is on that account absent. Even though sitting daily at the same table and unreservedly sharing all the good things going—and considering the flocks of geese duels. the flocks of geese, ducks, pigeons, and poultry abounding in most farm households, and the number of pigs killed off in

From this place they went by mother." However, the country population is, on the whole, still loyal to Rome. The "reverend father," as the priest is called, still exercises the most potent influence over the deeply religious temperament of the simple village folk. Unlike the English clergyman, he does not go visiting his flock, but keeps himself aloof from social intercourse, though without the slightest suggetion of a haughty reserve. When meeting his parishoner during an occasional walk he invariably exchanges very amiable remarks with them, and undoubtedly feels quite embarrassed by their extreme wishfulness to kiss his hand. Although he is, as a rule, by birth one of them, to be singled out by him for a little chat is looked upon as a great honour; and this great respect for the "reverend father" survives even the breath of scandal which may occasionally, though rarely, arise out of his private conduct. "After all, he too is human,"

Just as the priest is looked up to in matters connected with the as an authority in matters connected with this world. Under his suggestion there may be established a reading club, a singing club, a gymnastic club; waste places are planted with fruit-trees; the communal wood is properly looked after; his expert knowledge in bee-keeping and gardening comes in useful. The fact that his suggestions are readily acted upon would Mrs. Frank McDonald and Miss Barof itself stimulate him to do his best for the common good. And let it be understreed that he is looked up to only to the extent to which he proves his greater knowledge. The foremost place in the social scale undoubtedly belongs to the village priest, since squires there are none. The priest is, as a rule, a Roman Catholic clergyman.
