

HELEN MOIR

LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXII.

"Tis a passing shower," said Hermann. "Yonder overhanging rock will give us shelter till it is over. Ha! there is a flash; a thunderstorm is at hand."

The ascent was steep and difficult, and it was not without much effort and breathless climbing that, hand in hand, they found themselves under the overhanging crag.

The recess was deeper even than it seemed from below, while its rugged roof extended far enough to give ample cover from the rain.

With that great darkened air seemed visibly to darken more, till the gloom appeared closely to enshroud the valley.

And blacker still grew the sky, and darker still the air, save when that vivid flashing beam shot from the bosom of the cloud, and was seen wherever the eye looked, starting it by its sudden intensity of light.

"Oh, Hermann, it is terrible, terrible," said Helen, as in the dry recess under the crag they looked forth on the awe-inspiring spectacle.

"It is very grand, very sublime," answered her lover. "This is like our thunderstorms on the Rhine, but the peals are more prolonged by the lofty and far extending hills.

"Fear not, my Helen," cried Hermann soothingly, for the blending gleam which flashed in their faces was like the glare of a furnace, and they felt its heat on their cheeks and brow as if it touched them.

"Fear not," he repeated, when the reverberation allowed his voice to be heard. "We are safe here. The lightning may shake the crags or the trees on the crest, but it will scarcely penetrate to this recess. Courage, my love, it cannot, long continue."

Indeed need courage, and that of no ordinary kind, sit there amid the terrors of the storm, the roaring rush of the rain, aggravated every moment by the rising noise of the swelling torrents and the streams, whose channels but an hour ago were dry as summer dust.

When the storm was at the height of its fury and grandeur, conversation between the two was impossible. They could see each other's pale and stricken faces through the gloom, or lighted up by the vivid illuminations; and had they spoken their words might have been lost.

Between peal and peal, and the lightnings seemed flashing and darting everywhere. By one arm thrown round her, Hermann held Helen close drawn to his side; his other hand was tightly clasped in both of hers.

A red, turbid flood was now pouring down the valley, fed by innumerable torrents descending from the slopes on either side. Every seam and scarp in crag and precipice seemed turned into a water-course, and the main stream of the glen had swollen into a reel, rushing river, rising above the highest point of its banks, and surging against the rocks and the bases of the knolls.

And surging against the rocks and the bases of the knolls, pools and lakes sprang up in every hollow, the surfaces of which appeared to boil under the descending rain-drops. The whole glen flooded and drenched and steeped in water, and still from the black cloud it came pouring down with unabated fury.

The people of Goderich are enthusiastically in favor of the establishment of a line of boats along the shore of Lake Huron to Fort William for which many advantages are claimed.

A special meeting of the town Council has been held to appoint a delegation which has proceeded to Ottawa, to confer with the Government along with deputations from Hamilton and Sarnia.

It is a matter of interest in this subject. They have made arrangements for two first-class boats to be put on as soon as navigation opens, provided the postal subsidy can be obtained.
