Flies carry disease in three ways. First, by the excreta; laboratory tests show that when flies feed from germladen material, such as privy vault contents, sputum from cuspidors, dead logs, etc., the garms are not killed by passing through their bodies. Second, the crushing of a fly's body may cause an infection, if the fly has had access to infected material. Third, by the acumulation of infected material upor

When a fly has had access to human excreta, as found in privy vaults, the chances are at least 1,000 to one that it will have upon its feet the germs of typhoid, dysentery or tuberculosis. Here, again, laboratory tests have shown that the feet contain thousands of these dangerous germs. Flies so in fected that are permitted to enter your dining room and roam around over the viands on your table, will leave a trail of disease and death on whatever article of food they are permitted to touch. Then, if you or any of the memebrs of your family eat this infected food, you and they have eaten and swallowed the filth that the flies left on whatever articles of food they

Typhoid, dysentery, tuberculosis and diphtheria are by no means all of the diseases that are carried by flies. Oth-ers that may be mentioned are dysentery, epdidemic sore eyes, erysipelar and cholera. At all events, the fly i a most dangerous pest.
