'Tis pleasing to learn that the "disciple's" skin, which was recently pronounced illfavored, is now convalescent. I hope to receive cutaneous information thereon, from time to time, through the medium of the News, but the scurvy remarks in which he indulges shows that he is troubled with an itching which gnaws beyond the cuticle, threatening to prostrate a frame, which, never strong, was on a late occasion offensively styled rickety. I now close my correspondence with the "Humble Disciple of John Knox," and whilst invested by him with a sacred character, I dismiss the " follower " with my blessing.

As for "Vox Populi," he is evidently a misnomer, if not, his production is a sad reflection on the intelligence of the masses. VOX.

unfeigned pleasure the tremendous keelhauling that the trenchant pen of "Vox" has administered to the " Humble Disciple of Knox" (?) who, while privately professing the greatest contempt for religion and its teachers, has publicly presumed to speak for the Scotch clergy as a body. It was also pleasant to observe how cleverly "Vox" strip ped this self styled "Disciple of Knox" and blatant (professed) Moral Reformer of his borrowed plumage and exposed him to his fellow citizens as the miserable daw that his past acts prove him to be. For the consolation of the used-up writer in the News, I would suggest that if he were to drop the discussion of theological subjects and take one up with which he is more familiar, he would stand a better chance with the powerful voice before which he has subsided. Were he to follow my advice he might very appropriately cease to style himself an "Humble Disciple of Knox" and adopting instead as a signature the title of "An Humble Disciple of Paul de Kock's," reproduce in an improved and more pungent form his famous essays on "Faith, Hope and Charity." I give this advice, Mr Editor, in all sincerity, because it seems to me that if the writer in the News is allowed to become a religious enthusiast, we shall next find that even " the devil can quote Scripture for his purpose."
