

of nature—long-lost, but when found, bearing in plain characters their date and inscription.

Most borderlands of continents show marks of fierce pressure from either side, as if the earth's coat of mail had a weak point at the juncture of sea and land. Nowhere has this sideward compression been more tremendous than in Norway. The transverse cleavage of slates, and even gneiss and quartzite, give