"Unbribed, unbought, our swords we draw,
To guard the Monarch, fence the law."

OTTAWA, MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1869.

HIS MAJESTY of Prussia on opening the German Parliament expressed the utmost good will towards all nations. We do not for a moment doubt the good feeling which actuates that monarch, but the astounding fact that there are five and a half millions of soldiers armed, drilled and ready for the conflict, staggers credulity. Those who take delight in extolling the progressive spirit of the age, who talk of railroads, telegraphs and the vast indications of material progress by which it is distinguished, seem to forget that for many years of late the highest and most persistent efforts of science have been given to improving that art by which man proposes to destroy his fellows. The subject is trite, but its application at the present time is no worthy. The kings and emperors who have brought the art of war to such perfection by machinery, and who have made their countries into so many vast arsenals and parade grounds, breathe nothing but good will towards each other, yet mutual jealousy has made them arm, and that so extensively that at no former period of peace was there such an extraordinary spectacle as five and a half millions of men under arms.
