the right honourable gentleman, from his situation, ex officio, was the Bere, what to make of this new coalition, he knew not; it appeared to him to be one of those strange mixtures of an acid and an alkali, which, in a chymical preparation, generally produce a neutral; in fact, he said, it was like Herod and Pontius Pilate mixing together, therefore having so bad an opinion of the two descriptions of men that opposed this Peace, he should vote against the motion.

It now being past three o'clock, the members were so impatient for the question, that the House was in a continual uproar. After several members had spoke, the question

That this Committee

Great Britain

and

ship, either from the acquisitive positions, of evidence

when the numbers were

Ayes —

Noes —

Majority for approving the Terms of Peace —

Lord [illegible] after thanking the various members who had spoken, as also the [illegible] he said [illegible] of the Address already presented to his Majesty.