Historical Battles-Noteworthy Events in the Story of the Creation of the Buitish Emni-

Blenheim, 1704.

After the events chronicled in our last, there ensued a long series of wars at home, in Scotland and Ireland, follast, there ensued a long series of wars at home, in Scotland and Ireland, followed by the death of King William and accession of Queen Anne. Next came the war of the Spanish succession, in which England became involved, supporting the claims of Archduke Charles to the Spanish throne with Holland and Germany, against France, the monarch of which country the powerful Louis XIV claimed it for his grandson, afterward Philip V. The first act of the war was a naval operation at Vigo, in which the English fleet destroyed all the rich galleons found there. An English army under the command of the Duke of Marlborough was sent to the help of the Low Countries, landing in Holland in in June, 1704, 18,352 men strong, Marlborough was placed at the head of the united forces of England and Holland, and marched boldly into the very heart of Germany. "British Battles," describing the operations of the war, says, he formed a junction with the famous Prince Eugene of Savoy, the able commander of the Imperial troops, with whom he prepared to attack the French and Bavarians, though they held a strong position near the village of Blenheim, on the Danube.

The army of Tallard and the Elector The army of Tallard and the Elector amounted to 66,000 men, with ninety pieces of cannon. Prince Eugene's, when mustered in the lines of Bethel, amounted to only 30,000; but when united with Marlborough the Allies numbered 52,000 men, with fifty pieces of cannon. The latter were superior in cavalry.

of cannon. The latter were superior in cavalry.

The plain of Hochstadt presented a fine position for defence. A considerable stream intersected it, forming morasses on its borders, and running into an angle of the rapid Danube. The plain itself was six miles long, but unequal in breadth, the entrance to its being in width "a cannon-shot" of those days. On one side it was bordered by the wood of Schellenberg, then becoming tinged with autumn tints; on the other by the Danube' with the pretty little villages of Oberclau, Schonbach, and Litzheim, which afforded admirable points for defence.

Camille d'Hostun de Tallard, a proud, haughty, and fiery officer, commanded the right of the French army; the left was led by the Elector with his Bavarians, and the Marshal Ferdinand Count de Marsin, with the French of his division.

with his Bavarians, and the Marshal Ferdinand Count de Marsin, with the French of his division.

In the greylight of three o'clock on the morning of the 13th of August, the generale was beaten, and the Allies moved forward to attack the French position at Blenheim. Their movements, on the left, commanded by Marlborough, were for a time concealed by the wood; and those on the right, where they were led by Eugene, were at first mistaken for those of the Prince of Baden's corps, then lying before Ingoldstadt; for so negligent were the French that they had neither spies, scouts, nor patrols to inform them of the motions of the enemy. Their foragers were all out, and their camp was in perfect repose, when the right wing of the Allies was first discovered by the beams of the morning sun being reflected steadily on their bright barrels and fixed bayonets.

Their foragers were all out, and their camp was in perfect repose, when the right wing of the Allies was first discovered by the beams of the morning sun being reflected steadily on their bright barrels and fixed bayonets.

They had still time to make some arrangements, though taken completely by surprise. The advance of the Allies was delayed and impeded by the marshy nature of the ground they had to traverse. Thus Tallard might easily have drawn up his infantry by the margin of the stream that joined the Danube, instead of which he threw twenty battalions and squadrons into the village of Blenheim, where they were surrounded by the Necelbach, and a curvature of the Danube on three sides, and were too far from his order of battle to sustain themselves, or too be sustained by his own division, which had no other in fantry than eight battalions of Piedmontese deserters, and was too remote to give any effectual opposition to the passage of the Nebelbach by the British.

The Irish regiments of Lee, Clare, and Dorington, all clad in red coats were posted in the village of Oberclau, in advance of the right wing of Marsin's corps, which was chiefly composed of cavalry. By these mistaken arrangements, the plain of Hochstadt became memorable as the place where a fine army was annihilated by the ignorance of its leaders.

As they debouched into the open ground from the edge of the wood, the allied generals beheld at once the defects in the French order of battle; and the genius of Eugene suggested the plan of masking Blenheim and breaking the French centre. The Duke approved, and to the prince's energy and resolution was committed its execution, and the right wing of the Allies was reduced, in order to strengthen their left. This alteration took two hours, and the movements were made under cover of the wood, and unseen by Tallard, towards whom the Allies advanced in eight columns—the Imperialists on the right, the English and Dutch on the left.

All this astonished the Elector and the two marshals, who had thought of attacking and not being attacked. They fired two pieces of cannon to call in all foragers and stragglers, and made every preparation for defence. ("History of Prince Eugene of Savoy, 1742.")

In addition to all this, he ordered several hamlets and mills, of which the skirmishers of the Allies might avail themselves, to be set on fire; and on the extreme right of Blenheim he placed a division of gensdarmes a cheval, with special orders to charge the British: o soon as a certain number should have passed the Nebel.

By all this he overstrengthened the right of his line, while his centre and left were comparatively weak; but until the fire of Eugene's columns was heard in that direction, Marlborough resolved to make no attack, and he gave orders that the chaplains of the several battalions should perform divine service at the heads of their respective regiments. So passed the noon of Blenheim, till an aide-de-camp came galloping from the allied right, with tidings that "the Prince of Savoy was ready to begin the attack."

And even while he spoke the boom of cannon came across the level plain. At that moment the Duke of Marlborough chanced to be sharing a hasty meal with the officers of his staff, but seach others' hands, while mowed down by the fire of the French artillery, which was splendidly served, closed in to the assault. In the van of those columns were the brigades of Generals Rowe and Ferguson, advancing with such speed that though many officers and men fell, "the gallant Rowe struck his sword into the enemy's palisades before he gave the word 'Fire." ("Cannon's Records.")

Cutts' division assailed the village on three sides; but secure behind their barricades and entrenchments, the garrison poured in a fire so murderous that no courage could bear up against it; and the stormers, after actually laying hands on the palisades, were driven back (Rowe was mortally wounded), and in retiring, leaving their dead and wounded covering all the ground, they were assailed by the gensdarmes a cheval, who came thundering on them sword in hand, and would inevitably have destroyed them, had not General Lumley sent forward five squadrons to their support.
