Mr. Bair incorporated in the bill the provisions of the bill promoted by the Trainmen's Association, requiring every engine to be equipped with "power drive-wheel brakes," and that the air brakes must be capable of being applied to a sufficient number of cars on the train to enable the engineer to stop the train without the brakemen being obliged to use the common handbrake for that purpose.

Provision was also made for the use of automatic couplers operating by impact, and for means of uncoupling cars without brakemen being required to get between the cars.

Contrary to the usual custom, neither the performers nor managers were presented to their Majesties. Walker thought that the King was the "real thing." He said he had a fine, jovial face, and that the Queen was perfectly lovely. He expected that their Majesties would be stiff and icy, but instead they were warm and enthusiastic. "Yes," interposed Williams, "The most Royal acting persons were the servants? The King looks like a good fellow." What most strongly impressed Williams was the behavior of the children and the extreme and unfalling gallantry of the little boys towards the little girls. He said he would never forget their manners. He saw a little girl chase a dog across the lawn. In so doing she passed the Queen. Immediately the child stopped, curtsied, and then renewed the chase. Walker said; "It was a great afternoon for us. I understood this was the first time their Majesties ever had musical comedians at the palace. I hope we entertained and interested their Majesties as much as they did us."
