

THE USURPER

"Oh, if you are going to rake up all the old things I promised," she retorted with a laugh. "But there, don't you think we've quarrelled enough for one night, Lord Lorrimer?"

"We have not quarrelled," he said, gravely. "You couldn't quarrel with me if you tried."

"And I do try, goodness knows!" she exclaimed, "but that's the worst of it. If you would only consent to be offended, I should get rid of you, but you won't will you? Won't you try just to please me?"

"And so here's Lady Marlow, and you may go," interrupted Audrey, half saucily, half sadly, for she was touched by her lover's persistent dog-like devotion.

"All right," he said, not a whit offended. "Good-night. Good-night, Lady Marlow."

"Rachel! What are you doing here—how did you come?" he asked, his voice growing harsher with each word; and he looked about him as if he feared they should be seen.

"You ask me that?" she replied, her dark eyes fixed on his face. "How did I come? By foot! I have walked all those weary miles, but you do not care how I came. Why have you made it necessary for me to come? Why?"

"This is absurd and childish of you, Rachel," he said at last. "You got my letter," she said, in the same low, despairing voice. "Truly the cruellest letter a man ever wrote to the woman he once loved! Jordan, have you—have you forgotten all that you promised me—your solemn promises? It is not so long ago—not so long! You cannot mean what you said in that letter. You cannot have it heart—even you—treat me so cruelly!"

"Jordan flinched with his feet, and, keeping an eye on the street, turned up the collar of his coat and pulled his hat over his brows."

"My good Rachel," he said, "you—cannot expect me at this time of night and in the open street, to stand here talking with you. We shall be seen, and—" in this world—at least with satisfaction. It appears, however, that my not unreasonable expectations were doomed to disappointment, and instead of acquiescing in the—er—degrees of Providence, and falling in with my view of our mutual obligations, you have thought fit to follow me to London, and here in the public streets—my dear Rachel, I did not deem you capable of it!—to force yourself upon me and—er—make a scene."

"Come," he said, "let us part as friends, my dear Rachel. We will not exchange any more harsh words. You will see the wisdom of the step I have taken—to—and our little friendship, and I am sure you know me better."

"Know you! Yes, I know you!" came pantingly from her writhing lips. "I know you now! Oh!—she raised her clenched hands and let them fall again heavily—"oh, that I should ever have been deceived by you! How—my God!—how could I ever have believed in you! For one single moment? Why couldn't I see that you were a devil and a monster instead of a man? But I was alone in the world, and innocent—no father, mother, friend, to warn or guard me, and—"

"She broke down and leaned against the park railings, covering her face with her hands and shaking with sobs that brought no relief."

"Jordan gnawed at his under lip and looked round watchfully."

"Come, come, my dear Rachel," he said, soothingly. "Permit me to say that you take too black a view of—of the case. Now let us be more cheerful. Your future, as I have pointed out, is provided for. The money I have offered—"
