France at Home and Abroad. IT would appear to be the destiny of France to be never very long in a state of inactivity. She has a certain amount of energy to expend, and it is necessary it should either be expended in revolu tions at home, in wars with her neighbor in Europe, or in aggression against semi States in various parts of the world. It is against those last she is using force at present, though many signs indicate, or should indicate, to her statesmen, that it would be true policy nearer her frontier, and far more power was being formed against her. France was spreading herself on the Congon in Cochin China, and in the Island of Mada gascar. Under ordinary circumstances this aggressive policy might not be amis leaving out the moral complexion of th question as unfortunately not governin the conduct of powerful nations; but, look ing at the sinister aspect of affairs in Europe, it is not a wise policy. By he action on the Congou she angers Portugal. which claims possession; by her aggres sion in Annam she stirs up the grea land looks with open hostility upon he conduct in Madagascar. It is quite tru England has done the same by other weak nations and worse: but then a the old saying goes, circumstances alter not dealing now with the justice of things but with their expediency. They say whom the gods wish to destroy they fire cause to go mad, and it really seems as the gods mean the destruction of France Germany is her bitterest enemy, and sh is playing into the hands of that power as nicely and as naturally as the heart Bismarck could desire. Nothing please the man of blood and iron better tha that France should go on exploiting abroad and isolating herself at home The stand taken by France on the Egyptian question estranged England completely, and after all resulted in a los of French prestige in the East and in North Africa. Any affection that might be entertained for her by Italy on accoun of race, affinity and services rendered in 1859-60, has fled since the occupation of Tunis, and, besides, nations do not recognize the virtue of gratitude. As for Austria, she is the humble servant of Germany, and hates republican France, as all the kings do, dreading contagion. as well they may. Fate seems to be pushing France-once great and glorious France-into the claws of Germany, and alliance, obtain a foothold on her soi once more, then woe to the vanquished. This is a time in which the extreme temperance man, and the man who does not go far as prohibition, may enter into a compromise without either sacrificing an iota of principle. In plain words, must confess it does no good, and never will. It is a dead letter, laughed to scorn by those who persist in selling liquor of the struggle.
