What was his speed between 9.45 and 12? During all this time he was in ice. His second or conservative allowance for his own speed between midnight and 4 a.m. was only 5 knots, although during that watch he was in ice only 2½ or 3 hours. It is true that between 12 and 4 the wind was brought more ahead; but still it seems safe to tween 12 and 4 the wind was brought more ahead; but still it seems safe to argue that his speed through the inshore ice between 9.45 and 12 did not average more than six knots from 9.45 to 11, dropping to say 5½ from 11 to 12. I submit therefore that at midnight he would have been at a point say 1½ miles inside his supposed course and about 6 miles to the northward of his supposed midnight. northward of his supposed midnight
