CHAPTER XXII

"You may rely upon my perfect silence," he said.

"Thank you," replied Diana, turning her head proudly away from him, for she was not accustomed to ask favors.

"I cannot," said Sir Lisle, "express to you my surprise, and, permit me to add, my gratification at feeling you again."

She raised her face, which was radiant with delight. What a pleasure it was to her her eyes told plainly, as did the lovely tremulous smile that played round her lips.

"I am pleased also," she said, gently.

But the smile on her lips passed quickly. She lowered her eyelids and drew back with a hauteur that surprised him. She once more remembered that he was the man whom she had gone out to avoid; the man to whom she had resolved to be ungracious, the man whom she had resolved to hate because he was a relative and favorite of Lady Cameron. A curious sensation came over her; she liked, yet disliked, this Sir Lisle, head of the Scarsdale family.

"Did you see much more of the picture?" he asked.

"I remained for some hours after you left," she replied. "Do not speak of it, if you please."

"I will obey you," he said, gently.

He wondered much what the mystery was—that could have taken the beautiful brilliant young heiress to the National Gallery for a whole day, and alone.

At that moment Evadne crossed the room and joined them. There was something in the smile on her face, half innocent, half defiant, which put Diana on her guard; there was a world of malicious amusement in her eyes.

"Mamma will be quite happy now," she said. "All day she has been longing to introduce you to Diana; now her wish is accomplished."

"To my infinite delight," declared Sir Lisle, with a low bow.

Diana drew back with frigid hauteur, for she knew that some insult to herself was always hidden behind Evadne's compliments and smiles.

"I have an idea," said Evadne, looking at them with her head a little on one side, "that you two will be great friends. You have many tastes in common."

"You could pay me no greater compliment," said Sir Lisle.

Diana's face grew colder, and marked displeasure was plainly to be read on her countenance.

"Miss Cameron's affection for the House of Scarsdale will be a matter of history," laughed Evadne. "It is only right that she should know the head of the illustrious race."

It was on Diana's lips to reply that she had seen quite enough of the House of Scarsdale, but she felt that it would be undignified to bandy words.

Sir Lisle's eyes seemed to drink in the sweet beauty of her face.

"I have been made perfectly happy, Miss Cameron," he said, suddenly. "Would it interest you to know how?"

"Yes," she answered, briefly. She could hardly be civil to him while Evadne stood near with that smile on her face—a smile that seemed to say: "See how 'superior' our relatives are, after all!"

"Lady Cameron has invited me to Ferness," he said, "and I am rejoicing at the prospect."

Diana's face darkened at the announcement. Evadne laughed a little laugh that was more eloquent than words. The scene of the previous night rose before the minds of both girls, and Diana's heart beat fast, while a torrent of hot words rose to her lips. She was tempted to cry out to him: "Ferness is mine. I have been its mistress; it has been my privilege until now to ask and reject. Ferness is mine, not hers." But her better self came to the rescue, and she forced back the words that were already on her lips.

Diana's face was cold and set as she answered:

"You will be sure to like Ferness. Every one does."

"Mamma intends making several improvements there," said Evadne. "She wants to remodel the household after the fashion of Stonedale."

In a moment the warm blood rushed into Diana's face, and her eyes flashed fire. Suddenly she found that Sir Lisle was watching her with intent, earnest gaze. She would not even appear to have heard Evadne's irritating remarks, but turned away, saying gently:

"You must judge of Ferness, Sir Lisle, when you see it."

Then she left Evadne and Sir Lisle together, under pretense of choosing a flower, and went to the little conservatory. She wanted to be alone for a few minutes to realize that which even yet she could hardly believe.

That this knightly gentleman should be Sir Lisle was the most curious of all the strange turns of fate. Only a few hours since she had thought of him as a hero, she had dreamed of the dark, beautiful face with its shade of melancholy; and now it proved to be the head of the detested House of Scarsdale, the beloved relative of the woman she hated.

CHAPTER XXIII

Diana looked back many times on that evening with wonder and regret. It seemed to her like a mist through which she could see nothing clearly, which she could see nothing clearly, Colonel Hughes was delighted with her, and she could see that with him she held the first place. She was more to him than her father's wife—indeed, that courtly and diplomatic lady was quite beyond the comprehension of the good old soldier; and the circumstance seemed to afford Diana a gleam of satisfaction and delight.

Gayety reigned in the boudoir in Mayfair on that evening. They had music, cards, and conversation. Lord Clanronald came in, and looked with jealous eyes on Sir Lisle, who was conversing with Diana near the conservatory.

"Miss Cameron," Sir Lisle was saying, "I have a strange feeling upon me that I shall wake up presently and find that I have been dreaming. I can hardly realize my own happiness in seeing you again."

She stood before him in the sweeping folds of her gray velvet, tall, fair, and stately—her face fairer than the lovely one Sir Lisle had been entranced with in the National Gallery.

"Will you, I wonder," he continued, "be angry with me if I tell you something, Miss Cameron?"

She did not raise her eyes from the sweet carnations that she carried.

"No, I shall not be angry, Sir Lisle," she said. "I am never angry without a cause, and I am sure you would not willingly give me any."

"I am sure I would not," he answered, wishing that she would raise her eyes and look at him. "I am delighted to have the chance of telling you," he added, "first, how from the moment I left you I have been longing to see you again, and how grieved I was that your name was unknown to me—that your face has never left me, that I could not forgive myself for not having tried to see more of you. And now—I find that you are Diana Cameron!"

"Yes," she said, slowly. "I am Diana Cameron."

"And it is possible that I may see you every day, and that we may become friends?"

Her heart beat in response as she raised her eyes to him and answered: "I shall be glad to be friends."

Then, to his amazement, the soft flush faded from her face and an angry light came to her eyes. She drew back with a stately gesture full of contempt, for the thought had obtruded itself upon her that he was the head of the House of Scarsdale and the beloved relative of her father's wife. He could not understand the sudden change; perhaps she was displeased by the frankness of his speech.

"I am afraid," he said, with an air of apology, "that I have displeased you."

"I am not displeased," she replied, coldly.

How could she help hating a Scarsdale? The cloud that hung so darkly over her bright young life was owing to a Scarsdale. She wished from the depths of her heart that she had never seen him; and again she felt that his presence brought her more joy than anything else on earth. To her great relief, Colonel Hughes came up, and under pretense of showing him some flowers Diana led the old soldier away.

Sir Lisle looked after them with longing eyes. Why had she not turned to him and said, pleasantly, "Come with us, Sir Lisle!" She must have known how he wished to be with her. Why had she turned from him with the gesture of a queen? He could not understand her. He was not an impulsive or impetuous man, and this was only the second time that he had

PREDICTS BIG MAJORITY FOR CAPT. KEAN

(Special to Evening Telegram) COACHMAN'S COVE, Oct. 19, 1919.

Capt. Kean spoke last night. He, a Union stronghold. His audience spell-bound for two hours. Only interruption was from a local council. He shouted "too far," but the Captain ignored, but went on and gave an unvarnished truth as he had the whole district. Left great applause with hearers. I predict a big majority. I know of who could have done so well.

W. S. SULLIVAN

THE ESSENCE OF COAKER'S DISORDER.

(Special to Evening Telegram) SALVAGE, Oct. 19, 1919.

Government candidates held meeting at Salvage and Bish on Thursday night. Great confusion prevailed, and there was interruption. They held a largely meeting at Salvage Bay last night. Winsor and Forbes were quieted to, but Morine was interrupted by outlying parties. The meeting was continued and completed a speech, while the fellows who were outside shouted and pulled one the building and others factually tried to break up the meeting. It was closed with the Anthem and cheers for the candidates who were here. The ringleaders were Coaker, who was clearly organized and expressly inspired by the O. S. S. The House of Asses spring when Morine was flayed. The respectable people of Bay are ashamed of the disorganization. There is no reason to be so, as they were outsiders. After the meeting was over they threw rocks and struck one man heavily. The candidates were full of very essence of Conkermism and as one speaker said, God country if it gets control.
