

Mother and Her Baby Are Relieved of Eczema

DR. CHASE'S OINTMENT.

Mrs. Peter A. Palmer, Salt Burn, Sask., writes: "Dr. Chase's Ointment has completely relieved me of eczema and piles. I also used this Ointment for my baby, who broke out in eczema. A few applications were all that was necessary in her case. Dr. Chase's Ointment has been worth a hundred dollars to me—before using it I had spent a great deal more than that in unsuccessful treatment from doctors. We have also used Dr. Chase's other medicines, the Nerve Food having restored my health after suffering from severe nerve trouble when a girl."

CHAPTER XL.

The letter was given to Annette to post, but Annette had been informed of the habeas corpus business, and, under the impression that it was some monster of death, she simply gave the letter to Captain Parker.

"Thank you, I'll post it," he growled, when his eyes fell upon the name. "Yes," he added, to himself, "I'll post it—in the fire!"

About midday the big bell in the yard clanged loudly. This was the bell near the entrance in the wall that surrounded the captain's house, and the watchful Jim cautiously opened the gate.

He saw before him a tall young man of prepossessing appearance. "A gentleman," thought Jim, "and a good-looking one at that; but, there, these law chaps do look guileless. Hello! he roared.

"Is this 'Captain Parker's place'?" asked the visitor.

"It is," was the ungracious reply. "Then permit me to enter. I wish to see your master."

"Not much. It ain't the master, but 'n young lady you're after. She's gone."

"Gone!" echoed the visitor. "Here! stand aside, you blockhead! I must learn whether she has gone and when. My name is Campbell. Take me to your master at once!"

"No use," grumbled Jim. "I'm up to your tricks. The master's out. Every body's out. They went a week since, and won't be back till Christmas!"

With a chuckle, he banged the huge door to, and watched Noel Campbell sadly walk away from a point of vantage on top of the wall.

He duly reported the affair to the captain, but was certain that the visitor hadn't brought the "corpus" with him.

The next morning there were two letters from Campbell—one for Miss Sterne, and one for the captain, but the old gentleman sent both back again unopened.

had sickness at the Parkers, and kept the poor old chap up half the week."

"All right," the landlord said. "The stranger strolled out, but as soon as he reached the corner of the next street he jumped into a waiting cab and was driven rapidly to Waterloo railway station."

It was nearly eleven o'clock when Jim woke up, and even then he was annoyed with the landlord for disturbing his slumbers.

"Closing time, Jim. Don't want me to risk my license, do you? Your friend promised to be back at ten."

"Eh? What friend. What's the time?" yawned the old sailor.

"Eleven o'clock, man."

"Eleven!" he yelled. "I've been doctor'd; I can taste it! He was no friend of mine!"

Jumping to his feet, he dashed through the open door for home. He found the place in an uproar, and the captain swearing nautical oaths in volleys.

Annette was there in a state of hysteria, but her mistress was gone. A lady had brought a letter to them in the church. It was from Noel Campbell, and they had been driven to Guy's hospital, where he was supposed to be lying at the point of death.

The note said that he had met with a street accident, and wished to see Miss Sterne before he died.

Annette had been left in the cab, while her mistress went into the hospital with the strange woman. The maid sat still until she began to feel alarmed. Then she insisted upon going to the hospital, and found that no one named Campbell had been admitted. The authorities knew nothing of a recent lady visitor.

The cabman could give no information. He had been hired by the lady, and paid for six hours' work in advance.

The captain abused Jim until he was breathless; then he swore at the gout, at himself, and threatened to shoot Noel Campbell on sight.

"We can do nothing to-night," he groaned, "except warn the police, and that is useless. Oh, you rum-drinking, whisky-soaked brandy cask!" he roared, once again turning his wrath upon the luckless Jim. "If anything happens to that angel of a girl, I'll have you run out to the yardarm, after kicking at the rope's end till there isn't a particle of sense left in your lubberly body!"

They sat up the whole of the night, but there were no tidings of Elsie; and before eight the next morning the captain pocketed a six-chambered revolver and started in quest of Noel Campbell.

CHAPTER XLII.

It was wonderful how easy the captain threw off his gout. For days he had pretended that the pain was simply excruciating, for the reason that he wanted an excuse to explain why he did not offer to escort Elsie for a walk or drive.

She was altogether unaware of the "guard at the gate," as the Parkers had decided that it would materially add to her nervous worries if she thought such precautions were really necessary.

The captain had tried to persuade her from going to church. He declared that the persons in the neighborhood were a dull set; but Elsie argued that she would enjoy the music and the change of scene.

"Well, then, there are tramps, and it will be dark when you leave church. I suppose I must send Jim to look after you."

He sighed resignedly, but remembered that no act of the officers of a civil court came into effect on a Sunday.

"Poor little girl," he added, to his wife; "she's fretting for news of the City of Richmond. Now I'll talk to Jim."

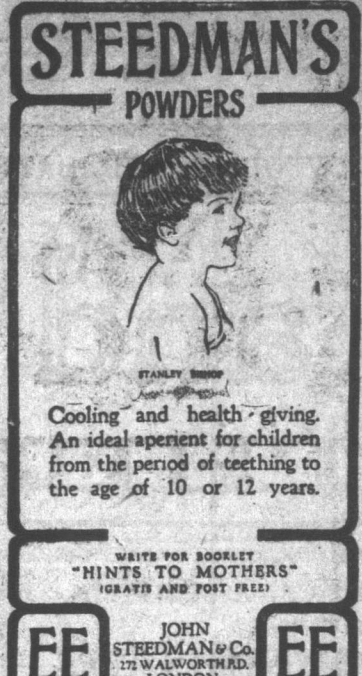

He did talk to Jim, and bade him not to lose sight of Miss Sterne and her maid under any circumstances.

"Follow them into church, you unholy villain, and be prepared to repeat the minister's text to me."

"Ay, ay, cap'n," said Jim, solemnly. "That'll be proof that I haven't disobeyed orders."

He winked at the wall, and passed one horny hand across his mouth in anticipation of what was to come.

He was particularly careful to keep the young ladies in sight until they vanished through the church doors. He saw them seated in the captain's pew, listened at the door until the text was announced, and wrote it down in his notebook, little dreaming that every movement had been watched by a

Recovery in Japan

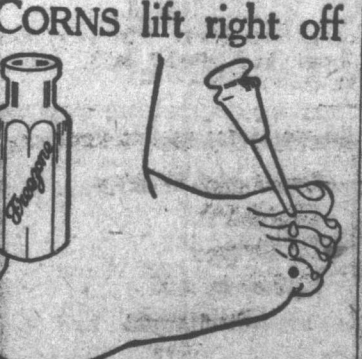

Programme of Reconstruction Extended Over Long Period.

More settled conditions are developing in Japan, and active reconstruction plans are now receiving the attention of the country. It is unofficially reported, says a cable to the Far Eastern Division of the Department of the Department of Commerce, that reconstruction expenditures during the first five years will reach only $25,000,000. Of this amount $375,000,000 will be spent in Tokio and $150,000,000 in Yokohama. This is taken to indicate that either the damage caused by the earthquake was not as great as it appeared, or that the program of reconstruction will be carried out over a longer period of years.

While a special session of the Diet will convene on Dec. 10, instead of Nov. 10, as previously reported, and the regular session on Dec. 25, it is promised that the plans of the Reconstruction Board will be made public before the date set for the special session.
