He hesitated a moment, and then did go by the window.

"Play me something, he said, and stuck his hands deep into his trousers pockets. She complied sweetly. The moon show, the banjo tinkled, the soft wind sighed through the firs. The pair sofe wind sighted through the first. The pair strolled slowly side by side, Laura playing sortly. Suddenly and unexpectedly, when they were far down the drive, she whipped the banjo under her arm, half turned, and stood still.

"dack!"

"Well?"

"Tell me what it is."

"Fell me what it is."
"What what is?"
"O, you must know! Your trouble, your wretched books, your silence—the way you have avoided me these two days. Jack, darling, tell me what it is; tell me what it

She pressed forward and clung to his arm. His face was raised to the moon, the curly hair thrown back from the forehead; face and forehead were wrung and wrinkled with pain.
"I cannot!" he grouned—"I cannot!"
She drew back. "Jack, if it has to do

She drew back. "Jack, if it has to do with me-with your love for me-."
"It has not! No-do not touch again. I am not fit for you to touch. O, Laura! I am a liar and a villain!"
"I shall never, never believe it!"
"Then I must tell you everything. Can you bear it?"

"I can bear anything but your silence,

They walked side by side in the moonlight, very, very slowly; but their shadows on the shiny drive went wider and wider apart. Often he paused; but she put in no word, no syllable, until the whole shameful tale was told.
"Is that all?"

"You have kept back nothing?"

"I swear I have told you the worst."

"Ah!" (a deep sad sigh)—" well, I was hasty to say I never could believe you a coward or a villain; for I am afraid you have been both."

"More view was your sad, but, very firm

Her voice was very sad, but very firm.

"I know it! I own!" said Lovatt in a low, husky town. ". one knows except myself the mean despicable cur I have been. Yet it seems hard to hear it from your lips-you that have bewitched me so! I swear, until two nights ago, I was bewitched! I seemed to have forgotten her, and my life cur there convolutely interfy. But then I dreamt of here completely, utterly. But then I dreamt of her—dreamt I saw her dead! And now she haunts me, now that it is too late. For what can one do after so Leave me a little: then I will try to tell you. I cannot think in your preence."

He moved on, howed and broken and learn-

He moved on, howed and broken and learn-od over the plain wooden gate at the entrance to the drive. It might have been a moment later or an hour (he never knew) when she toached him on the shoulder. "Will you do what I tell you?" He bowed submissively. It touched her to see him so sadly humbled—and all at once—

He bowed submissively. It touched her to see him so sadly humbled—and all at oncebefore her stronger will. Her own power rose up before her, and frightened her. With a calm, strong, spiritual effort she nerved herself to use this will of hers for once as her conscience ordered her heart forbade.

"Will you go back to her?" The words came in a tremulous whisper; but the tremor was only the vibration of taut, resolute nerves.

When he had bowed his promise (for though his lips moved, no words left them), and when thus it was all over, a greater calmness, and with it a chill dread feeling, came over this strong minded girl.

"I tell you to go back to her," she said, speaking quite steadily now. "Go back toher at once, Leave England within a fortnight, atlatest, from now. This will be easy; we are all in our last week here; and you and I must not a part until my father telegraphs forme, which must be to morrow. Then you go back to her, and all is over for even between you and me. You may findher dead; but between us two all, all is over. "Her leave whistoned as she through and and me. You may find her dead; but between us two all, all is over. All is over?"

Her dress whispered as she turned and went. The tall trees on either side the drive whispered too; and their dewy leaves, quivering in the moonlight, shimmered like phosphorus on a dark and tranquil sea. Over the gate the black hills cut out into the moonlight, we though heaven and hell touched, one sky as though heaven and hell touched one another; above, the stars were shining like the eyes of angles; below, the fir trees sigh-ed and sobbed like the spirits of the lost.

VIII.

One night some two months later, a night of intense darkness and of intolerable heat, a young man tramped into Timber Town from the south. He did not carry the "swag" of the common traveller, nor were his clothes bushman's clothes. He wore a sait of some tim light material, and a pith helmet; yet, for all this, he seemed to know every inch of the way.

His tactics indicated a desire to glide swiftly through the township without either stopping or being stopped, if possible without being seen. He took the very centre of the broad straggling street, and showed in this a nice judgment, for the night was so abnormally dark that from neither side of the street could one see halfway across it. But the flaring hotel verandalis on either side were plain enough from the middle of the road, and not only could the traveller hear the sounds of recould the traveller hear the sounds of revelry issuing from them—for these had been audible for the last half-mile—but he distinguished some of the voices, and caught scraps of the high-toned conversations. In inguisher some of the voices, and caught scraps of the high-toned conversations. In what was generally known (though not from its signboard) as the "opposition sharty," they were talking polities.—Colonial polities, and in that instance tipsy ones. In the verandah of the Royal, however, a more practical discussion was on foot—the ringing of the Timber Town church-bells. One roysterer wanted to ring them at twelve o'clock—it was then 11.40—another roysterer objected on traditional grounds. The latter said the good old English custom was to ring in the New Year, but not Christmas; the former ridiculed the notion that old English customs should obtain, unchallenged, in the bush; and this one, who was the more fluent swearer of the two, and had all the popular arguments on his side, seemed to have a majority of roysterers seemed to have a majority of roysterers with him.

"The bell ringers win—it's odds on them," said the new arrival, and he hurried noise-was soon in the region of the little iron the was soon in the region of the little from church for whose bell-ropes those roysterers' fingers were itching. The church was invisible in the opaque darkness; but the traveler knew well enough where it was. The State school and the police barracks, on the other side of the road, were also invisible, at all events their outlines were; but faint lights received their whereabouts. lights revealed their whereabouts.

The mysterious visitor now left the middle of the road, skirted the police barrack fence, and came—with steps that all at once became halting and unsteady—to the school gate; and there he paused, and started backward with his hand upon the latch.

Barbara was seated in the verandah, leaning forward, her head bowed and her hands clasped. Seth Whitty bent over her.

"You know how I have waited," he was pleading—and dignity and humility jostled each other in his deep manly tones; "how long I have loved you, how hopelessly once, how deeply all through. You must know that what I profess is at least true."

"I know that. O, I know that so well!"

"Yet you still refuse me."

"No, no. I say, give me time. Do not

"No, no. I say, give me time. Do not count upon me; never again count upon a ann. And I have said I will give you until we both are gray!"

"It shall not be so long as that, if it is to be at all," said Barbara gently; only do not count.

They were both silent. Seth disturbed the eloquent silence most radaly has desired They were both silent. Seth disturbed the eloquent silence most rudely by flying incontinently to the gate, where he stood motionless in a listening attitude.

"What was it?" Barbara called to him.

"I heard something."

"Can you see anything?"

"Nothing. The night is like pitch. But I feel certain—"

At that moment the halls.

At that moment the bells rang forth, and unholy shouts came with the clangour from the iron church over the way. Seth came back to the verandah.

"It was those men that you heard," said

"It was those men that you heard," said Barbara.

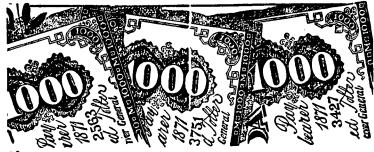

"I don't think it was; it seemed like footsteps quite near, and I thought some one touched the latch. But it doesn t matter now; for it's Christmas morning—Christmas again, Barbara! And I wish you a very happy Christmas, and—and I will wait as long as you like!"

"He reced ler lerder deopped; he took her hand again, and raised it reverently to his lips.

Those merry souls tugged at the bell-ropes until they were tired, and that was not im mediately. But before the wild ringing ceased the solitary mysterious pedestrian had retraced his steps rather better than a mile. None knew his coming nor his going; and the single street of Timber Town never saw him more. saw him more.

THE END.]

He-"I love you passionately, my darling." She-"Ah! That remark has the genuine engagement ring."
