

Canada is favoured in its endowment with a wide variety of present and prospective energy sources. As a country that is likely to be, for that reason, a net exporter of energy over the long term and possibly a significant one, Canada is also likely to be a relatively strong power in international relations. We can face the situation as confidently as any country. Our job is to ensure our future requirements, to use then our surplus resources to best advantage in the international market and to contribute as best we can to the broader international collaboration which is essential.