THE TALL MAN.

In the meantime the bridal pair had left the carriage and had gone into the vestry, whence they soon after proceeded to the altar, where the clergyman was awaiting them.

There was an appearance of considerable uneasiness in the circle of spectators. Half-whispered questions respecting some one who was absent; a noisy search for him; voices calling to each other, and mutual exhortations to speedy action, were audible.

It was indeed time that something should be done, for the clergyman had already got as far as the question whether any one could state any impediment to the marriage of the pair before him.

Then a man of herculean form stepped out of the crowd. It was Hiebendahl's former market-servant, Siegart, dressed in his working clothes, with a leathern apron and bare arms; he said, in a deep bass voice—

"Is it not true, your reverence, that a woman can not marry as long as her first husband is alive, unless she has been divorced from him? Now my dear old master, Herr Hiebendahl, whom may God long preserve, is not dead; he was not drowned in the Maine, as it was represented."

An exclamation from the bride interrupted the speaker.

"He lies! He is drunk!" shouted the enraged Blitterman.

"That will be seen," replied Siegart, quietly. "My old master is not lying buried at Bingen, but is standing as a sentry at Berlin, to which place a Prussian recruiting party conveyed him by force; he has sent many letters, one after another to his wife, his mother, and his friends, but some villain has always contrived to make away with them."

Agnes groaned and fainted away. Blitterman had turned as pale as death. The muscles of his face worked convulsively, his eyes glared like those of a rattlesnake, his hands were clenched, his lips as white as ashes.

"Produce proofs!" he gasped. "Produce proofs!" he exclaimed, excitedly, but speaking with difficulty.

"Where is Regina?" asked the market-servant, looking round amidst the spectators. She arrived at that moment at the church, and hastened through the crowd, who made way for her.

"Then I am not too late," she said, panting, "to prevent this wicked act. Herr Hiebendahl is alive! I tell you again and again."

"Produce proofs!" vociferated Blitterman.

"Where is Bertram Weiser?" asked Regina, looking round inquiringly. "He saw and spoke to his kinsman in Berlin, and received letters and money from him, with directions to come here and put an end to the tissue of lies which have been concocted and believed. The letters were stolen from him on the journey, but the tale is none the less true."

Blitterman uttered a shout of laughter. "Indeed," he said, "is that the state of the case? The whole scheme proceeds from the revenge of a bad boy; a boy who robbed his relations, cheated, lied, and is now lying again out of revenge. Where is the slanderer, that I may have him properly punished?

"Ha! he has disappeared; after having befooled a credulous crowd who were to shoot the poisoned arrows for him. And who are all those people around us? Common people, servants, clerks, workmen, who were deservedly discharged from Frau Hiebendahl's house, and are therefore glad to assist the boy's scheme. Rouse yourself, my beloved wife, and by giving me your dear hand, put an end to the wicked designs of those who are enemies to us both; and you, reverend sir, please to proceed with the sacred ceremony."

"If you really are unable to bring forward any further proof," said the clergyman to Siegart, "I can not discontinue the sacred ceremony which I have been called upon to perform. What does the bride say!"

Agnes had been restored to consciousness, though still weak from the shock she had received. She replied in a decided tone, "No—oh, no, I CAN NOT!"

"What!" said Blitterman, reproachfully, "can you really be so weak as to put any faith in these shameful scandals? to allow our enemies to triumph? What will your good mother say? Your refusal to have the marriage ceremony proceeded with may cause her death. Rouse yourself, dear Agnes, and think of your children!"

"I CAN NOT; IT IS IMPOSSIBLE! I would rather die; where is Bertram? Oh! bring him here," exclaimed the bride.

The bridegroom gave way to another fit of rage. His glaring eyes look round for some one on whom he might vent his exasperation.

All around were prepared to withstand any attack from him. In the meantime one of Hiebendahl's former clerks approached the agitated bride.

"Permit me," he said, in a friendly manner, as he offered her his arm, "to conduct you to your carriage. This is not the place for further revelations. All will be explained at home, and I hope to your satisfaction."

Agnes thankfully accepted the offer, and, accompanied by the crowd, left the church and entered the carriage, which set off without waiting for Blitterman, who, devoured by rage, was slowly following. The crowd hastened after it, and those among them who had formerly been connected with the house as servants or friends made their way into it. When the bridegroom, who was coming after them, saw this, he went hastily away, but soon returned with a lawyer to take his part.

In the meantime all the persons who were formerly in Hiebendahl's service, and had been turned off by Blitterman, arrived, and laid their complaints and accusations before the bride.

The complainants increased in number as the report spread of the scene which had taken place in the church, and they all lamented that the two ladies had placed so much confidence in the wicked book-keeper, and by their persistance in a life of seclusion should have prevented any friendly communication reaching them from any quarter.

Blitterman and his lawyer now stepped in amongst these accusers, and Blitterman, in an angry voice, desired them to withdraw.

"Oh, oh!" said Regina, "the book-keeper is not master of the house yet, and with our good-will he never shall be. Just see, Dr. Grundmuler," she continued, to the former family physician, who was present, "how ill poor little Dietrich looks. That is entirely from the poisonous sweetmeats which Herr Blitterman has given the children in large quantities, in order to get rid of them, and to be the only possessor of the fine income. I see the large parcels of the poisonous trash lying there now, which Herr Blitterman is in the habit of buying from the confectioner, who has already been frequently fined on account of their poisonous nature; you can see by their colors that they are all poisonous."

"Indeed," said the physician, after a careful examination of the sweets, "these colors appear to be most dangerous, and if the child has already eaten frequently of such stuff I do not wonder at his looking pale."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Agnes, horror-stricken. "Oh my poor child, what a horrible thing, if it is true; and you too, my Adolphus and my Leo."

"Look here, mother," said Adolphus, joyfully, "look into my little cabinet. Here I have stored away all the beautiful, bright-colored bonbons which Herr Blitterman gave to me and my brothers. We always had the stomache-ache whenever we ate them, so I took away the colored ones, and only left them those that were uncolored."

And indeed, in Adolphus' cabinet there was a large collection of the bright-colored sweetmeats, the sight of which caused as much joy to Agnes as it did annoyance to Blitterman.

"I will not fear," he said, "that you, dear Agnes, will place more confidence in my enemies than in me. I think I have proved by my actions how honorably I mean by you and your children. You would have been scarcely more than beggars if I had not worked hard in your affairs when they were in a very critical state. I am neither a sugar-baker nor a physician, and I bought the sweets which I gave your children of one of the confectioners in the town. If he really uses dangerous colors, I am not to blame, it must fall upon the authorities who permit such things. But to return to the chief point. Where and what are the proofs in favor of the lie which has been trumped up, and which has broken off our marriage? Herr Berthold will tell you what a severe punishment they may expect who have allowed themselves to be led on by the lies of a dishonest, revengeful boy, to disturb a sacred ceremony. Consider, dear Agnes, how you are exposing yourself to being talked about, here and elsewhere. For see, in this newspaper I have already announced our marriage as having been solemnized, and what will the world say if this be followed by a contradiction? There is still time, by acting decidedly, to save your honor and mine. Will you, dear Agnes?"

"No, no!" gasped the bride, in whose face might be seen a look of aversion to Blitterman.

"Think what you are saying," said Blitterman, harshly. "As my honor is at stake I shall be obliged to employ the whole power of the law, and rely on the justice of my cause against your breach of promise. Ask Herr Berthold the consequence which will ensue to you and your children."

"No, no!" cried Agnes, firmly. "Oh, what joy, if my dear Librecht is still alive; who can give me an entire certainty of it?"

"Yes, who indeed!" said Blitterman, scornfully. "A young vagabond, who, after throwing a lighted match into a powder-magazine, has managed to disappear."

"There he is!" cried Siegart, the brawny market-servant, from the midst of the crowd. The people parted to make way for Bertram, who approached his aunt with soiled clothes, and with his hands all torn.

The bridegroom turned pale at the sight of Bertram, but the bride uttered an exclamation of delight.

"Is my Librecht realy alive?" she exclaimed, eagerly. "Did you see him? are you sure you were not mistaken?"

"He is alive," replied Bertram, and the bride threw her arms around his neck. "I have seen him, and spoken to him, not once, but several times. He wrote to you, aunt, to his mother, and to many persons in Frankfort. It was his own beautiful writing which I know so well. Go to Berlin, and you will be convinced that I speak the truth."

"But where have you been, Master Bertram?" asked Regina. "You left us nicely in the lurch. You ought to have been with us as you promised; if we had all been like you it would have been too late to prevent the mischief."

"Hear what befell me, Miss Regina. I went to give information to all those to whom I had brought letters. I went first to Herr Dipport, as he lived the nearest, and told him my news as rapidly as I could. He seemed to believe me, and bade me follow him to another room where he had a friend who knew my uncle. I followed him into a low, dark room, at the back of the house—there was no one in it; he said he would call him to consult with us, and he went away, locking the door, and did not return. In vain I knocked and shouted; no one come. I spent the whole night in the dark; I was nearly dead with hunger and thirst. In the morning I discovered an air-hole, up to which I clambered by means of an empty cask, and I managed to squeeze though, and got over the wall of the yard—that is why I am so late."

"Herr Dipport," said one of Hiebendahl's old clerks, "has lately become a fast friend of Herr Blitterman, as I know the firm of Hiebendahl has money claims upon him, which he would be glad to clear off by doing a good turn to Herr Blitterman."

It became every moment more evident that some vile and tortuous conspiracy had been on foot, and that a lawyer ought to have the management of the inquiry. Agnes did not for a moment doubt the truth of Bertram's story; her heart believed it. She at once turned to the former clerk, and begged him to fetch a respectable lawyer, to whom she might commit the unravelment of this tangled web of falsehood and deceit. Blitterman blustered, but Agnes scarcely heeded his presence, she was so earnestly questioning and listening to Bertram. At last feeling that he made a very poor figure, Blitterman listened to the advice of his friend, and walked away with him. As he passed through the crowd, he heard words of detestation, intermingled with threats. Agnes determined to set off at once and to travel night and day to join her husband in Berlin. The old lady, the mother of Liebrecht, was so cheered by the news than she wished to go to Berlin also, but she was persuaded to remain behind and take care of the children.

The household servants, who had been discharged by Blitterman, were recalled, and the others dismissed. By the clerk's advice, Agnes did not meddle with any business arrangements; she only gave power to the lawyer and the former clerk to act in her behalf. It was evening before Agnes had set off on her journey, but at last accompanied by Bertram and Siegard, the old market-servant, she started in a traveling carriage on the road to Berlin.

TO THE FARMERS OF MIRAMICHI.

We have been Manufacturing

IRON FRAME MOWERS

For the last four years, and are now offering to the farming community this, the combining greater excellence of mechanical simplicity together with greater durability and entire reliability for all the requirements of the field, than any other Mower extant. —In construction they are similar to the celebrated Walter A. Wood's Iron Frame Mower, and the Richardson Buckeye, both American Machines. Of the former there are over 200,000 in use, and the extraordinary number of 20,000 were manufactured and sold last season, by the Wood Company of United States. We have over 500 of our manufacture now in use, every one of which (no exceptions) stands as a monument of the grand and unprecedented success of home manufacture and our enterprise. A list of our Agents in this section of the Province will be found appended, and farmers are requested to ask information of them relative to our Mowers in use in their respective localities, which will establish beyond doubt their unquestionable superiority over any other mower to be had in our market.

The facility of procuring all parts or pieces within a nominal length of time must show beyond the shadow of a doubt the claims such an enterprise has upon the farmers of the Maritime Provinces.

For the coming harvest of 1877 we will manufacture LARGELY in excess of our numbers of last season, and trust that our growing enterprise may find such inducements held out to it as will be commensurate with its merits.

Let it be remembered we have no hesitation at all times, in entering into a friendly competition in the field with any other machine in our market. WE GUARANTEE OUR MOWERS TO BE INFERIOR TO NONE. Farmers would do well to enquire prices and terms before purchasing elsewhere.

ST. ARMAND, P. Q., Sept. 12, 1876.

MR. T. J. B. HARDING:

DEAR SIR,—Being desirous that others may know something of the merits of your CONSTITUTIONAL CATARRH REMEDY, I wish to inform you what it has done for me. I am 29 years old; had been out of health for about five years. I had employed three or four different doctors, and tried various medicines, without receiving any permanent benefit, but continued rather to grow worse, until last fall, when I had become so bad as to be unable to do an hour's work at a time. Had severe soreness and pain under the shoulder blades and through the shoulders, with very lame back, and a feeling in my right lung as though there was a weight bearing it down, with a continual dropping in the throat and down upon the lungs. Such was my condition when I commenced to take your CATARRH REMEDY, one bottle of which eased my pains and gave me an improved appetite, and after taking four bottles I was restored to health, so as to be able to endure hard and continued labor, such as chopping and clearing land, at which I have been engaged the past season. My recovery I attribute solely, with God's blessing, to the use of your CATARRH REMEDY. Yours truly,
