The Widow's Son

By Mrs. E. Southworth

The doctor complied with her request, and then he went downstairs to seek the young man.

"How is your patient?" inquired Mr. Morley.

"She is dying. And she needs now only a physician of the soul." She is suffering from mental torture, from some hidden cause. She is a woman with nerves of steel and heart of adamant; so she does not prate of her remorse; yet I can see that she is suffering agony from that source. Go to her; she wishes to see you."

Mr. Morley immediately arose and hurried up into the chamber of death. The same burning black, phosphorescent eyes shining through the obscurity of the room as from some strange, unnatural lurid light of their own, drew him toward the bed.

"You are the Rev. Mr. Morley," said the dying woman, on the same in the same hissing whisper.

"I am; and I am very sorry to see you suffering so much," said the old man, gently.

"Oh I remember your voice now. You are the minister who dined with us on the first day of my arrival here."

"Yes."

"Are you a magistrate also?"

"I am; for the lack of a better one."

Silence fell between them for a few moments, and then she inquired:

"Are you alone?"

"No. Mr. Hare and Mrs. Stukely are in the room."

"Send them out. Our interview must be a private one."

Mr. Morley got up to do so; but the hissing whisper had reached Miss Nelly's ears, and she did not wait for the parson. Touching Mr. Hare on the shoulder to call his attention, she said:

"Come—downstairs and get some breakfast while Mr. Morley remains with our patient."

And the young medical student, worn out with watching and as hungry as his class are prone to be, gladly followed his hostess from the room.

Mr. Morley closed the door behind them, and thus shut them out from the knowledge of what passed within.

The particulars of that interview did not transpire for some time. One, two, three hours passed, and still the clergyman remained shut up in the room with the dying woman.

At the end of that time a bell rang, and Miss Nelly ran upstairs to answer it.

She opened the door suddenly and went in.

The patient was lying with her eyes fixed on the face of the minister. Mr. Morley had just risen from a little table that stood by the bedside with writing materials upon it. He held in his hand a thick, folded manuscript, which he carefully deposited in the breast pocket of his coat. Then he took from the table a long, folded paper, which he retained as he turned to take leave of the patient.

"Remember!" said the dying woman, "that is not to be delivered until I am laid in the earth."

"I will remember," replied the minister, very solemnly; "and in the meantime think you of your father and soul; for I, Redeemer's boundless love and the Father's infinite mercy. Pray for yourself; and I also will continue to pray for you!"

So saying, the minister moved to Miss Nelly, left the patient in her charge, and passed from the too hush-hall below he met the detective, Beck.

"Your prisoner is dying. Your responsibility as far as she is concerned is over. But take this warrant; read it if you like; and place it in the pocket of one of our county constables; and though you can not take an official part in making the arrest, I ask as a favor that you will give our officers the benefit of your great skill and experience in tracking the criminal."

"I will cheerfully give all the assistance in my power while I remain in the neighborhood, where I shall be while obliged to stay until the fate of this unfortunate woman is certainly decided," said Beck as he took the warrant and opened it for the purpose of reading it.

"And one warning in your ear. It is not necessary and by no means desirable, that this unhappy family should know anything about the matter at the present stage of affairs. They have now, perhaps as much trouble as they can well bear. It will be time enough to enlighten them when the criminal is taken," said the minister.

"I understand you sir; and I agree with you fully," replied Beck.

While they spoke, loud cries from Miss Nelly startled the whole household.

Mr. Morley and Beck, followed by every one in the house, ran upstairs and into the sickroom, to see what the matter could be.

They found Miss Nelly upon the bed, supporting in her arms the form of Mrs. Llewellyn, who was in her last death throes. Her wounds had commenced bleeding inwardly, and she was suffering in the hemorrhage.

As they hurried to the bedside Miss Nelly laid her burden gently back upon the pillow, whispering:

"She is gone; may Heaven have mercy on her!"

To Relieve Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness And Head Noises

Persons suffering from catarrhal deafness, or who are growing hard of hearing and have head noises will be glad to know that this distressing affliction can usually be successfully treated at home by an internal medicine that in many instances has effected complete relief after other treatments have failed. Sufferers who could scarcely hear have had their hearing restored to such an extent that the tick of a watch was plainly audible seven or eight inches away from either ear. Therefore, if you know of someone who is troubled with head noises or catarrhal deafness, cut out this formula and hand it to them and you may have been the means of saving some poor sufferer perhaps from total deafness. The prescription can be prepared at home and is made as follows:

Secure from your druggist 1 oz. Parmit (Double Strength). Take this home and add to it 2 pint of hot water and a little granulated sugar; stir until dissolved. Take one tablespoonful four times a day.

Parmit is used in this way not only to reduce by tonic action the inflammation and swelling in the Eustachian Tubes, and thus to equalize the air pressure on the drum, but to correct any excess of secretions in the middle ear, and the results it gives are nearly always quick and effective.

Every person who has catarrh in any form, or distressing rumbling, hissing sounds in their ears, should give this recipe a trial.

Then she slipped on her blue gingham wrapper and ran downstairs. Owen sat reading the morning paper by one of the front windows. The breakfast table ready, stood in the middle of the room.

The hands of the clock on the mantelpiece pointed half-past nine.

"Oh, Owen," she said with compunction glance at the clock, "I have kept you waiting so late! I am very sorry."

"It does not matter, dear; but as you are down, we will have breakfast at once," he replied.

Lily Gay rang the bell, and directed Nancy to bring in the coffee; and then she turned to Owen with another look of regret, saying:

"But to keep you so late from your business, Owen, I wish—"

"Say no more about it, Lily Gay. It is really of very little consequence. As I never was late in my life before can very well afford to be so, for once in a way, this morning."
