WORKING OVERTIME ON RAILWAYS.

Speaking editorially under the above heading the Toronto Globe very sanely says:

Six months ago three trainmen were killed in a collision on the Grand Trunk Railway, and the conductor of the erring train was tried and convicted of manslaughter. The presiding judge at the trial, addressing the jury, made light of the plea that the conductor had been doing extra time and had fallen asleep through fatigue. In this particular rect view of the matter, but it would ed to send in to Norman Mackenzie, be dangerous to take without qualification the ground that in all such their claims against the above named cases the overtaxed employee is alone

It is difficult for a servant of railway company, when it is operating its system with just as few hands as it can do with, to avoid working extra time, and if he were to refuse to do it when asked he would probably have to make way free to do or not do extra work, just must share the responsibility for accidents that are clearly due to excessive fatigue.
