Surprise Parties. By RUTH CAMERON.

spoke he said, friends. 'Yes, I've met him or her," and then carefully added, "but I don't really know him," or

"I know her very slightly." I liked that.

It's so different from the way many people do, especially when the names mentioned are those of people of any husiness or social prominence.

An Unhappy Surprise Party.

I was specially struck with the man's care not to claim more intithan he actually possessed, bealong this line which recently came to my attention.

A young business man told it to me. It concerned a family which had recently come to live in his neighborhood and with whom he and his wife became quite intimate. Mr. J. who told me the story is a railroad man. The new arrival in the neighborhood on hearing what his business was had been much interested. "I know Mr. G. very well," he said. "He came from the same town I did." Mr. G. is the Vice-President of the road on which Mr. J. works.

The Vice-President Didn't Recognize

Now it so happened that the two couples were eating together one day at a restaurant when Mr. G. happened to come in. On the way to his table he had occasion to pass by their table and recognizing his young employee stopped to speak to him. He chatexpected a recognition. When he finally did perform the rite there was part of the Vice-President.
