

NOT DIVIDED.

Together fifty years they trod
 The wandering ways of life;
 Then slept beneath the same green sod,
 Fond husband, faithful wife.

Their days to seventy years had grown,
 And, when he went away,
 She made no wild and bitter moan
 About his lifeless clay.

But, gently as a summer day
 Sinks to its beautiful close,
 Her life and spirit ebbed away,
 And into glory rose.

He died just as the morning beamed,
 And she before the night;
 A new, eternal bridal seemed
 The solemn burial rite.

Three generations of their name,
 Proud fathers, bridegrooms dead,
 And lovers in their earliest flame,
 Conveyed them to their rest.

In the low chamber gently laid,
 And heaped their couch with flowers
 And in their spirits softly prayed—
 "May such an end be ours!"

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

Four days after the attempt upon the King, and just eleven months after the presumed death or murder of James IV. at Flodden, the Queen Regent Margaret gave her hand in marriage, to Douglas, Earl of Angus.

Many of the nobles instantly withdrew from the capital disgusted with the turn affairs had taken, and not quite sure how Angus might act towards them. Those who remained either united themselves in the factions of Arran or Angus.

Conspiracies were rife, and Arran's party at first held in secret and afterwards boldly proclaimed that the Queen by her marriage had forfeited the Regency and the right of guardianship over the King.

Angus surrounded himself with a coterie of men who were bound to him by the strongest ties of self-interest; and amongst them was Heron Barras, Lord of Binram. The title and estates had been conferred upon him as the nephew of the late lord, and in acknowledgment of secret service to the Government.

Angus, whose bearing had been always as haughty as his ambition was great, now carried himself with so much of the dictatorial airs that all who were not bound to him by ties of interest or necessity hated him.

The new Lord of Binram, who invariably wore the mask of the jovial boon companion, was a puzzle to both factions. One thing only was certain—that he exercised much influence upon the proud Douglas.

On the day succeeding the marriage the Lords of Council were summoned together. Barely one-half of them answered the summons, and several of those who did answer it rose and quitted the chambers, in spite of the fierce looks of Angus, when they were informed that the Queen Regent had already deputed her new made husband to act for her in the Council.

The Council was broken up abruptly, and Douglas, with haughty indignation at the slight cast upon him, retired. Lord Binram—or Barras, as we had better continue to call him—had followed Angus, and when they had reached a private apartment the Earl turned upon him sharply.

"Well, what think you of these curs who would fain bite if they dared," he said grinding his teeth.

"Why, that so long as they dared not, you need not mind whether they would or no," responded Barras coolly.

"Ay, but they will try it."

"Let them; you can bite, too, I suppose."

"By the sacred rood they shall find I can."

"I am pleased your lordship sees it in that light; and so will change the subject.—Have you decided how you are to dispose of Spens?"

"Hang him and quarter him for an obstinate churl."

"He deserves it certainly, but you will not do it for all that."

"And wherefore not?"

"Because you must do it publicly; by doing so you will revive memories of the late King which may be detrimental to your affairs at present. No, no, that will not do."

"Then let him lie where he is till he rots."

"That will not do either; but if your lordship will give me your written order, I think I can remove him quietly and effectually out of the way."

"By what means?"

"I will hand him over to Scott of Tusshielaw; and if he escape him—why then let him live, in the saint's name, say I."

Angus hesitated; then hastily wrote the order; and with it in his possession and a grim smile of triumph upon his sallow face, Barras sought the Governor of the Castle.

In the Court he crossed the path of Mistress Douglas, who, attended by a page, was hastening toward the eastern wing of the quadrangle as if she were going to the King's chambers.

"A proud wench, soothly, and a bonnie one," he muttered; "a rare prize, too, for the man who hath wit enough to win her.—'E'en that man shall be none other than myself!"

As if gratified by the resolution he had come to, continued his way in search of the Governor. He found him at length and showed him the order he had obtained from the Regent's Consort.

"What do you purpose doing with him?" said the Governor, at once acknowledging the authority of his visitor.

"I will see him first, and I will tell you the rest after."

Barras was conducted to the dungeon. At the door he dismissed the attendants and entered alone.

The knight, although out of danger, was still feeble from the effects of the torture he had undergone. When he heard some one enter the dungeon he concluded that it was the warder, and did not look round.

Barras placed the cruzie he carried in a niche in the wall, and then stood for several minutes eyeing the prostrate form of the man he hated and had so wronged.
