

The Foster Brother; OR— The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER IV. THE TWO BROTHERS—THE FACTOR'S JOURNEY—HOMEWARD BOUND. Yet they were very far from being cool or calm, Stephen walked to the window with an erect and triumphant stride, and as he looked forth on the woods and fields, and said within himself, "These are mine—mine!" the elation of his soul was indescribable. His whole being had in those brief moments undergone a revolution. The vision of his life had without an instant's warning burst into splendour, and who can wonder if he was dazzled, and was bordering on a delirium? It would have killed some men outright. Malcolm naturally came nearest to a better command of himself. The affair had counteracting elements for him. It was his brother, not himself, who had come to the ownership of Ardgowan, and naturally the good fortune of another does not affect one so powerfully as it does the object of it. The cold shadow of envy was beginning to creep towards him, when it was suddenly chased back by the recollection that Stephen felt his only to the estate, and that the money-wealth of George would come to him. "Well," he cried, "who knows but my share may be as large as yours? The money you know—George's money—that is all mine."
