ANNABEL

THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXII.

IMPORTANT ISSUES.

Jerry had been laid on a settle which ran along one side of the kitchen. Notwithstanding his heroic efforts in the fray, and his constant presence in the front of the battle, he received but one wound—that murderous death-blow which Sam Lorton had struck him down. It had descended full upon his breast, and there a large gash had been inflicted, from which the life-blood had gushed forth in a purple stream.

Philip and the others drew near and gazed mournfully upon him as he lay calm and still, his long, dark hair sprinkled with gray, smoothed upon his shoulder by some gentle woman's hand. What deep pity and fierce regret filled the youth's heart as he gazed on the still form and white face, so pale and beautiful in its peaceful repose. This was the man to see and speak to whom he had undertaken his long and toilsome journey. Now was the journey rendered vain, for he had died ere the youth could reach his side to learn that secret which now could never be known—that secret which one word would have revealed, and thereby given honor and wealth to Annabel. Oh, it was hard to be disappointed thus; and when he reflected that Jerry's death had been accomplished for the very purpose of defeating his mission, a feeling of wrath rose in the young man's bosom, and his countenance grew stern and vengeful.

Steve Bodshanks stood by his side, silent too, and sad at heart; he gazed at the dead face of his friend and companion in many a hunting adventure. He knew better than any one there what a true, strong, generous heart had ceased to beat; what a noble and heroic life had been hastily taken away, and as he recalled many stirring scenes of the long past, the tears rolled down his cheeks and dropped like rain upon his friend's marble brow.

As thus they stood, the sound of many feet came trampling heavily along the passage, and Sam Lorton was dragged in to answer for his inexplicable crime. For inexplicable it was in the eyes of the settlers, who could not conceive why he, a white man, and an Englishman, should lead a band of Indians against the settlement, to burn and destroy it and them. He had openly shown himself the fiercest and most determined of the assailants, and he with his own hand had killed Jerry. The motive and purpose which had instigated him to this atrocious war to them a mystery, and no they sought to understand it by questioning him. For this purpose they had brought him into the presence of his victim, and also to try him after a slight formal fashion, for great as were their rage and indignation they would not send him to his doom without a show of justice.

They brought him in and set him against the wall in a sitting posture. It was with no gentle hand they had carried him; and in their gleaming eyes, stern faces, and compressed lips he might have read his fate. Evidently he did so, for he preserved a sullen, dogged silence, and met their angry looks with a ferocious scowl.

Stephen Bolton, a large boned, elderly man, and who, next to Jerry, was the principal member of the settlement, assumed the part of questioner. "What have you to say for yourself concerning this night's work?" he asked in a stern, wrathful tone.

"Nothing," was Lorton's sullen rejoinder. "Who are you, and why were you with the Indians?" "Haven't I said that I shall answer nothing?" "You are an Englishman, are you not?" "Yes, I may say that much," said Sam after casting a momentary but meaning glance at Philip.

"How long have you been in this country?" "Not long." "How long?" "Won't tell." "You are resolved on giving no explanation?" "Yes."

And Lorton snapped his thick lips together as he uttered this one word. Harriston Correspondence. Business still continues slack, farmers being busy at the fall wheat harvest. The weather thus far has been favourable. There were a few light showers but not enough to do any damage. The wheat is about all cut, and should the weather continue favourable, it will be all saved in a few days. The cattle fair on Friday was rather better than was expected there being a good attendance of both buyers and sellers, and the prices generally gave satisfaction.
