right of Americans and Canadians to the use of all fisheries and waterways; secondly, the abolition of all Custom houses along the American and Canadian border, and entire freedom of trade between the two peoples. Canada would then be required to raise her tariff against all other nations to an equality with that of the States. This would be a tariff discriminating against the mother country in favor of the States. This is apparently objectionable, but there is no help for it; it is a vital part of the scheme. To expect the Americans to lower theirs to the parently objectionable, but there is no help for it; it is a vital part of the scheme. To expect the Americans to lower theirs to the Canadian level is utterly out of the question. It may be asked whether this would not involve annexation to the States. It mights or might not, as the treaty was made; the armagement would be possible with or without. But to look at the results of the commercial without the political union, so far as Britain is concerned they would be these. American appital and enterprise would immediately turn Canadian resources to an account which five generations of Canadians will not be able to arrive at under the present state of affairs. The growth and prosperity of the northern half of the continent could not hope indeed to equal, but it would largely emulate, that of the American portion, and the result would be a demand for British goods and an employment of British capital which would not otherwise reach half the amount in half a century. This may be safely predicted from the trade which the States do with Britain. It may be well to notice that the high American tariff has never lessened the volume of British goods bought by America, which has steadily increased as the population grew larger. In 1865 the States bought of Britain 25 million pounds' worth; in 1885 it had risen to 51 millions, and twice in the interval was 38 millions.

The commercial union would please Cana-

The commercial union would please Canadians far better than the political one, as they consider their system of government much the superior of the two. But it would be unfair superior of the two. But it would be unfair not to state that certain advantages belong to the other—that greater monetary returns, more immigration, better openings for business might be expected. The representation of the provinces at Washington, friendly as they would undoubtedly continue to Britain, would be valuable to British interests in America. But while for a commercial agreement such as sketched out above a large majority of votes might be obtained in Cauada, it would madly be the case with the other.

It is not the future—either of these—I, as a Canadian, once hoped for Canada; but there is no other course. There was, but the time is past. The strength and wealth of the States must influence the course of the provinces. If
