REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Lillian's Emotion Almost Frightened Madge. As I alighted from the train at the , which there was something I could not habit of the last year tugged at me for told me over the telephone the things I most—needed to know."—I had the im-

Lillian's house.

Her door and that of the taxi opened simultaneously, and she was down the entrance step of the old-fashioned house before I had finished paying the man.

"Now!" Lillian said, when we were at last alone in her library, after she had given orders to Betty that she was not at home to anything save the most urgent message. She held out her hand for the letter, and I noticed that You father told me. It's on the table. Come into my room and take off your wraps."

"No dinner for me until you've read picky's letter," I said firmly, for I knew she had finished, dropped it in her lap and sat listless, inert, looking into space.

"Lillian," I ventured timidly at last, for the expression on her face fright all my creature comforts. "I've worsted my mother-in-law and beaten the record on train and taxi schedules to get this to you, and that's the first order of the day."

an instant, made me figure out the nearest subway or street car route to Lillian's home. Since Dicky went away I have ridden in few taxicabs, indeed, even trips to the city have been only the most necessary ones. I have found it necessary to count the pennies in a way that reminds me of my old school teaching days.

But, contrary to the usual order of things, my first thought was the sober one, my second, one of impulse. Neither economy nor any other commendable virtue should stay my rush to Lillian, who, I knew, must be anxiously awaiting my coming if she had received my father's telephone message. So I rushed up the steps of the station, hailed a taxi, and was whirled away to Lillian's house.

Her door and that of the taxi opened.

Hold me over the telephone the things I most—needed to know"—I had the impression that she had substituted the most—needed' for "wished"—'I would rather wait for the actual reading until after awhile, when there is no chance of our being disturbed.

"Come on now. Marion is wild to see you. She, 'of course, is to go to bed directly after dinner, but you know there will be no chance to talk while she is on deck."

Marion's wildly enthusiastic self flying toward me pointed her mother's words.
